Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask the gentleman with reference to the form in which the amendment is phrased. We have taken over the railroads under the war power declared by Congress; and does not the gentleman think it necessary to express that same purpose in this amendment? As the amendment now reads, the only purpose in taking them over is not to carry on the war but because they are competing with railroads that the Government has taken over; and I suggest to the gentleman that if he would consent to an amendment declaring that these roads are necessary for the prosecution of the war, it would bring these too within the war power.

Mr. ESCH. I certainly know that that is our intent. I had supposed, however, that putting this amendment at the close of section 1, it would be interpreted in the light of what is stated within section 1. However, if my colleague thinks that his suggestion would clarify and perfect the amendment, I have no objection to it.

Mr. LENROOT. I will offer such an amendment.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Before the gentleman offers that, will he let me ask him one question?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I want the gentleman to enlarge on that phase of his amendment where it refers to the short lines as competing lines, and to define the limitation of the word "competing," as to how many that would perhaps take in.

Mr. ESCH. No doubt the short-line roads must be competing roads under the interpretation of my amendment; and if the Federal Government assumes the supreme right and power of routing freight, it practically takes from them the power of competition, because they will not get the freight.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Does the gentleman understand that the short lines that are to be taken over under his amendment are practically all considered as competing lines?

Mr. ESCH. Practically so.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. So that they would not be excluded by some executive order stating that they were not competing?

Mr. ESCH. No.

Mr. BANKHEAD and Mr. FRENCH rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. ESCH. I yield to the gentleman from Idaho.

Mr. FRENCH. Is "competing line" so defined that it will not admit of some interpretation or construction that would rule out a good many lines that we are seeking now to relieve by the amendment?

Mr. ESCH. I think those words are well defined by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and that that is a well-understood expression.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I would like to inquire if a short-line railroad such as I have in mind, that is simply a feeder to another line, would be included in this amendment?

Mr. ESCH. Is it an independent line?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It is owned separately and operated entirely separately.

Mr. ESCH. Yes; it would be included.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended two minutes, in order to enable him to answer an inquiry that I desire to propound to him.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Wisconsin be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I will ask the gentleman, my colleague on the committee, whether or not the section in the bill known as section 9, dealing with these short-line carriers, was not prepared and submitted to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce as being satisfactory to the short-line carriers?

Mr. ESCH. I do not know the origin of section 9. I only know that some very distinguished Members of the House presented it to the committee, and the committee indorsed it understanding that some of the short-line carriers approved of it. But since that date we have been getting communications from short lines throughout the United States to the effect that it would not meet their situation. So I have felt that we can well afford to incorporate the short-line roads in the general system.

Mr. MONTAGUE. My own memory was that a committee of the short lines drafted this amendment, and that it was submitted to the distinguished gentlemen whom you mention, as well as to our committee, as satisfactory to them.

Mr. ESCH. I do not know that; but I do know this, Mr. Chairman, that in the hearings the representative of the short-line roads, Mr. Robinson, offered a proposed amendment to the effect that the Federal Government should guarantee the indebtedness of the short-line carriers; but that did not meet with the approval of the committee.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. I will.

Mr. NORTON. I will say that I know from talking with several owners of short-line railroads that section 9 does not meet with their needs or demands at all. There is nothing in section 9 that would make certain that the Government would take over the short lines. Section 9 provides that the Government may send additional freight over these lines to compensate them for that which might be taken from them and sent over more direct lines in case of need, but in case the short line runs into a section of the country where the Government does not use the other lines at all in general transportation there is no provision for taking over the short line, and it may be injured very much by taking over the other lines by the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee desire recognition?

Mr. SIMS. I did, but I want to wait until the arguments have been developed.

The CHAIRMAN. Does anyone desire to speak in opposition to the amendment?

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to be recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. In opposition to the amendment?

Mr. MADDEN. No.

Mr. BARKLEY. I desire some time, but I do not care to use it just now.

The CHAIRMAN. If no Member desires time in opposition, the Chair will recognize some other Member.

Mr. BARKLEY. Then, Mr. Chairman, I will take the time now. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will not be agreed to. I do not know whether I can in five minutes' time give the reasons why it ought not to be adopted, but in the first place the President took over these railroads by reason of the act of August 29, 1916, which gave him discretion as to taking over certain systems of transportation or any part thereof. That law left it in his discretion to determine whether all the roads were needed for Government purposes, and the presumption is that they were taken over to aid the Government in winning the war.

Now, whether he has taken them all over or a part of them only is a question of fact. Whether he has taken over some that will not be needed and will turn them back to the owners, as provided in the bill, and also in the bill adopted by the Senate, is left to his discretion until the 1st of July. He is given that much time to determine whether any railroad system and how many are needed by the Government for war purposes.

Mr. QUIN. Is it not apparent that the Director General of Railroads will not take these short lines over?

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not know whether it is apparent or not, but if they are not needed by the Government of the United States they ought not to be taken over, and Congress ought not to force the President to take over the short lines or any other railroad not needed by the Government to carry on the war.

The representatives of the short lines came before the committee; they came rather in opposition to being taken over, though willing to be taken if necessary. They thought they had been taken over and they were opposed to the terms upon which they thought they were taken over.

Mr. DILLON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. DILLON. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the short-line people were before the committee opposed to being taken over?

Mr. BARKLEY. They thought when they came here that they had been taken over, and they came to protest against the terms of the bill or the compensation that they were to have if taken over.

Mr. DILLON. As a matter of fact, were they not in favor of being taken over?

Mr. BARKLEY. I think after they found that they were not taken over they immediately concluded that they wanted to be taken over. But, be that as it may, it is an unwise policy to load the Treasury with the burden of taking over a lot of short-line railroads that will not be needed by the Government in the transportation of war material or in the conduct of the war.

I have in view a little short-line railroad of 12 miles in length. There is no use that it could be put to in the conduct of this war, and yet under the terms of the gentleman's amendment the Government will be compelled to take it over, and if it does not come within the terms of section 1 it can go into the Court of Claims and set up a claim for compensation. It seems to me that we ought not to compel the President to take over some insignificant railroad that wants to be taken over because we have provided a method of compensating them.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Is the gentleman in favor of the provision that authorizes the President to purchase securities of railroads?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the gentleman think that the purchase of securities is necessary to the prosecution of the war?

Mr. BARKLEY. It may not be necessary now, but it may become necessary when the railroads attempt to compete with the Government in the money markets of the world.

Mr. WINSLOW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I will.

Mr. WINSLOW. Is it the gentleman's judgment that many financial institutions in certain parts of the country are carrying the securities of many of these short-line roads?

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not know in what proportion, but I presume that some financial institutions are carrying securities of these lines.

Mr. WINSLOW. Am I not right in stating that the evidence before the committee was largely to the effect that a majority of the short lines had securities pledged to the banks in their district?

Mr. BARKLEY. It is true, and equally true that a great number of short lines, from a business standpoint, ought never to have been constructed. They were constructed to reach out into sections of the country where it was hoped that they would be money-making institutions, but they were not. These will be taken over under the gentleman's amendment the same as those that have been more prosperous. There are many institutions going to be affected by the war that the Government can not take over or guarantee because they may be affected in some disadvantageous way by the operation of the trunk-line railroads or as a result of the war.

Mr. WINSLOW. I want to ask the gentleman if in his judgment it would not be a great calamity to have a large number of institutions embarrassed by virtue of the omission to take over these roads?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, before we go any further, I want to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] if we can not agree on some time to debate this amendment, which is entirely new both to the committee and the House, and that the time be divided equally.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I am willing to make such an arrangement. I have requests now for 30 minutes.

Mr. SIMS. Then, I ask unanimous consent that further debate on this amendment and all amendments to the amendment shall be concluded in one hour, the gentleman from Wisconsin to control one-half of it and I to control one-half.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL], who desires to be heard?

Mr. SIMS. On this amendment?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. It is according to whether he favors it or is against it.

Mr. FORDNEY. He desires to offer a letter that he received from a railroad man and he would like to have time to insert it at this time.

Mr. SIMS. If he is for the amendment he can get time from the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a suggestion. I have no objection now to proceeding for an hour with the consideration of this amendment or such amendments as may be offered to it, and then at the end of the hour, if it seems to be that the question has been fairly discussed, debate could be closed. I suggest to the gentleman that he let it run along for an hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that all debate upon this amendment and all amendments thereto shall close in one hour, one-half of that time to be controlled by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH]. Is there objection?

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee that we make it an hour and 20 minutes.

Mr. SIMS. Very well, I accept that amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I suggest again to the gentleman now that he proposes an hour and twenty minutes, that this question has not received much consideration by the tenderfeet—neither has the bill; and by the tenderfeet I do not mean the white-button mandarins, with great respect to the gentleman and his committee who have reported this bill; but there are 420 of us here who are not on that committee. The reason I ask the gentleman to extend the time is this: If it be true that a billion of dollars plus is invested in these short-line roads, and if they are taken, the presumption is that in whole or in part they will be thrown into the scrap. If the Government takes over the roads that are not short lines, and thereby throws a billion of dollars of property into the scrap heap, is it at all just that something of compensation should not be made?

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman is arguing the merits of the proposition.

Mr. CANNON. I am not asking the gentleman in respect to the merits of the proposition, but suggesting to him its importance. I hope he will let it run along for a time.

Mr. SIMS. Oh, an hour and twenty minutes' time is all that is asked for by the leader on that side, and I have consented to that. That seems to be fair.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman who is the chairman and the leader of the committee on this side can not agree without consulting the remainder of us.

Mr. SIMS. I submit the request, and that is all I can do; that debate upon this amendment and all amendments thereto close in an hour and twenty minutes, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] and the other half by myself.

Mr. CANNON. And the gentleman declines——

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Illinois will pardon me, I think it will not be necessary for a limitation to be made in the division as to the affirmative and negative. I think perhaps there are two or three times as many who desire to speak for the amendment as against it, so that if the time be divided by the gentleman on this side and on his side I think very likely that all who desire to speak upon the question can be taken care of.

Mr. SIMS. I have suggested that the time be divided equally between the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] and myself, to be yielded by us.

Mr. TOWNER. But the gentleman suggested that it be divided in respect to the affirmative and the negative of the question, and I suggest that he control the time, granting to those upon that side, whatever their position might be upon the amendment, and the time here to be granted to those on this side that desire to speak, that all might be taken care of.

Mr. SIMS. But it is more logical to control with respect to the affirmative and the negative of a proposition.

Mr. TOWNER. I agree to that, but I think the other would save time in this instance.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, my request has been submitted. We do not know how many amendments are to be offered to this section. Now, after debate has run along upon this amendment for half an hour, I am suggesting 1 hour and 20 minutes more under this rule, and it seems to me that that is extremely liberal for one amendment.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If the gentleman does not propose to give any further opportunity for amendment, I shall have to object.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee that debate continue for an hour and twenty minutes on this amendment and all amendments thereto, one-half to be controlled by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH]?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this amendment and all amendments thereto close in 1 hour and 20 minutes.

Mr. CANNON. And to that motion I offer an amendment striking out "1 hour and 20 minutes" and inserting "2 hours."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that all debate upon this amendment and all amendments thereto close in 1 hour and 20 minutes. To that the gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment that all debate close in two hours. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the motion as amended, that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in two hours.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. SIMS. Now, I did not notice whether the gentleman from Illinois included in his motion that one-half of the time should be controlled by the gentleman from Wisconsin and the other half by myself.

Mr. CANNON. I think it had better be left with the Chair. Evidently the gentleman does not need as much time in opposition to this amendment as those who are for the amendment.

Mr. SIMS. The Chair will recognize the gentlemen alternately, and then only for five minutes, and certainly the gentleman from Wisconsin and myself can serve the membership better than the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that one-half of the time be controlled by himself and one-half of the time be controlled by the gentleman from Wisconsin. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for one hour.

Mr. SIMS. I yield five minutes additional to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, under the terms of the law under which the President took over these roads it was provided that he might take possession or assume control of any transportation system or systems or any part thereof. Now, it does not follow, and I do not think the Members of the House ought to presume, that merely because a railroad is a short-line railroad that it is not taken over. There are many short-line railroads that are taken over. There are many short-line railroads that will be taken over if they have not been already taken. The question that governs the President of the United States and which he must consider in determining whether a particular line of railroad is taken over is the question within the meaning of the act of August 29, 1916, as to whether it is a system of transportation or a part of a system of transportation.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SNYDER. With reference to the Government's responsibility in taking over a short-line railroad the Government will have no further obligation than to keep the road in the condition it received it and hand it back in as good a condition. Is that right?

Mr. BARKLEY. That is not all.

Mr. SNYDER. The Government takes no responsibility in paying larger earnings to the short-line roads than they are now making or were making in the three prewar years?

Mr. BARKLEY. If the Government is compelled to take over all short lines in fixing compensation, they will be entitled either to have a contract with the Government for the period of Government control or they will be entitled to go to the Court of Claims under the provisions of the bill and establish what they are entitled to for the use of the road while the Government has it.

Mr. SNYDER. But that could not be more than it was in the three prewar years?

Mr. BARKLEY. It could not be more if they come within the provision of the standard return and they enter into a contract with the President based upon the standard return; but suppose these short-line railroads have made no earnings during the period of three years?

Mr. SNYDER. That is what I am trying to get at.

Mr. BARKLEY. Suppose they have no standard return in that period. Then they do not come under the standard return, but there must be a contract on the basis of the standard return or come under special abnormal circumstances that entitle them to a more liberal consideration than they would have been entitled to under the standard return; and the standard return, of course, being averaged on the net operating income for the three-year period, and having no net operating income on which to base a standard return, they will have the right to demand of the Government a special contract with them covering the period of Federal control or go to the Court of Claims and establish a claim against the Government for their use. It may not be necessary to haul more than one freight train over one of these short lines to bring it within the terms of the bill, and they could either demand a contract of the President or go to the Court of Claims to ascertain their claim against the Government.

Mr. SNYDER. After all, I can not see wherein the President, or whoever would make this contract with the railroads, would get any authority from this bill to give the short lines more than they are now getting.

Mr. BARKLEY. It would give no authority to give more than the standard return, but you understand there are many of these short lines that have no standard return because they have no net operating income during the three-year period, and therefore are put in the class of special, unusual circumstances or abnormal conditions that the President must take into consideration in entering into separate contracts with those railroads, and which will be extremely unwise with such obligations upon the Treasury.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL].

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not assume to be an expert on the railroad question, neither do I believe I am well versed in all the intricacies that are involved in this important bill, but I do believe I have a few practical ideas about the result that will follow if this bill is passed as it now is and without this amendment. We propose by this amendment to take in short lines as well as long and more important lines. I have no doubt that it was important to the Government during this war to take the railroads over as has been done as a war measure, and as such I am for it. No Member in this House will go further than I will go to sustain the President in his efforts to win the war. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] says it may not have been necessary for the Government to take these short lines for its purposes, but I submit that if the Government takes the large and important railway systems of this country to the exclusion of the others, that it will have left them out in the cold and will, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] said, simply put them in the scrap heap. There are seven of these railroads in my district. I know how very important they have been to that section of the State: First, they have developed the country. There have been built along these lines a number of important and progressive cities, and if these railroads are left out of this bill, and they are not taken over by the Government with the others at this time, they will lose their credit; you will destroy the capital invested in them, you will hurt the towns that have been built along these lines, you will take from the people adjacent to these roads their present mail and transportation facilities or greatly lessen their efficiency.

Some one in this discussion has said the Government did not take cripples in the draft, and should not take small crippled railroads. The illustration was both unfair and unfortunate as an argument. True, the Government did not take the boy who was weak and crippled, but it did not add to his infirmities. If he had lost one leg, the Government did not cut off the other. This proposition is to take large competing railway systems, throw the strong arm of the Government around them, but leave the small roads to "root, hog, or die," with the powerful support of the Government extended to their competitors. By such legislation you will lessen the business of the short roads, you will destroy their credit, you will do them an injury that is vast and will be irreparable.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I have but a moment's time. If I had I would be glad to yield. I will yield if you will give me the time.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have not got it.

Mr. RUSSELL. I know that these railroads have been very important to the country, and they have usually been built by local capital. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY]—I do not know whether he is present to-day or not—told me yesterday that he knows of one instance where a lady has her all invested in stocks or bonds of a short-line railroad. She had made arrangements to sell her holdings and believed she was going to be able to sell to good advantage; but when this action by the Government was taken the contract fell through, and that lady now seems likely to be pauperized unless these small railroads are included in this order or in the benefits of this bill.

I submit that this Government is too big, it is too magnanimous, to do an injustice of that sort; that is, to pauperize thousands of people in this country by such a discrimination. I was impressed with the splendid speech made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] when he was talking about the large interests involved in this proposition—first, he said, the millions invested in railroad property; then the 1,750,000 employees that do the work. The distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] then reminded him that there were 110,000,000 people in the United States also interested. We can not say how many, but I doubt not that there are thousands of people to-day interested in the stocks and bonds of these little short-line railroads, and oftentimes women and children in our home communities. I do not care whether the Government needs them or not; it can not afford by affirmative action of this sort to do that which will certainly result in great injustice to a large number of the people of this country, not only the stockholders but the shippers and citizens along these lines.

This amendment should be passed. You ought to carry out by your vote to-day the Democratic and Thomas Jefferson idea of "equal rights to all, special privileges to none." [Applause.] I submit that this amendment ought to be carried as a matter of justice, even if it does not prove to be a good financial investment on the part of the Government. I know of post offices in my district that are run at a loss to the Government, and I know of rural routes that are so run, but they are conducted for the convenience and for the benefit of the people. The rights and the interests of the people should be considered now. Is the Government going by this act to pauperize thousands of people in this country that have by their courage and enterprise built up and developed our country and towns along these lines? I hope not. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB].

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to be personal, but it is necessary in order to make this statement. I am interested in the short-line railroads, as there are something like 43 in North Carolina. After a conference with a number of gentlemen who are vice presidents and secretaries and treasurers of these short lines, they wanted something done to protect them in case this railroad bill passed. They told me they were not asking that the Government take them over, though they were perfectly willing to be taken over, but their chief concern was that if they were not taken over by the President's order nothing should be done that would injure them so as to destroy their securities, $800,000,000 of which are outstanding. A number of us got together, among them the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], and we drew the main features of this section 9 of the bill, which seemed to be satisfactory to the short-line railroad representatives who were here at that time.

One of them who was present was Mr. Robinson, president of the Short Line Roads of the United States, who had just gotten out of the hospital after 10 days' illness, and was in my office.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Bird Robinson, a representative of the Short Line Association.

Mr. WEBB. He struck me as being an intelligent man. I do not know where he lives. I read this section 9 to him, and he said that it was satisfactory. He realized that they could not get all they wanted, and that that was the best they could hope to do under the circumstances. This section simply takes care of them and leaves them in statu quo, as we say, in case the President does not take over a short-line road which he conceives not to be useful to the Government in time of war.

The main thing the little roads wanted, it seemed to me, was that routing instructions over these small roads should not be interfered with by the Government. In other words, that if a man wanted to ship a car of freight to Ohio by way of a short line, the freight each way being the same, he ought to have the right to select the road over which he ships. That is where the competition in securing freight comes in. That is why agents go out and solicit freight for their roads. They wanted, if a shipper should route freight over their short-line roads that were not taken over by the Government, to let that routing stand, and not permit the Government to do anything to deny the shipper the right to direct the freight over a short-line road.

Now, that is the first thing we covered in the section. The next thing, they ought to be protected in their traffic arrangements and agreements with the big roads; that the taking over of a trunk line by the Government ought not to permit the Director General or anybody else to uproot and destroy their reasonable traffic arrangements which were permitted under the interstate-commerce law; and therefore we added that nothing in this act should be construed to change routing instructions and traffic arrangements on such lines as may not be taken over by the President.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman realizes, of course, that there are a large number of these short lines which are merely feeders to the other lines. Now, I think that the provision that the gentleman has just referred to would not protect these roads if the main lines were to continue to be operated in the same manner as they were operated before, but does not the gentleman think that when the Government orders certain routings over these roads that that will interfere with all the freight over the roads and interfere with these short lines?

Mr. WEBB. Not if section 9 is obeyed. We provide that nothing in this act shall affect the routing instructions over or traffic arrangements of such roads as are not taken over by the Government unless the routing instructions prejudice the movement of Government supplies or war materials. If that is done, nobody would object. We thought further that there might be a case of a jam or a blockade at some point, when it would be to the public interest to route freight temporarily away from a small line, which would ultimately relieve the jam, and at the same time take away some of the routing over the small roads. Therefore in case that is done, then a sufficient amount of unrouted freight after the emergency is passed may be routed over the short-line road to compensate the short-line road for its temporary loss in revenue.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Such lines as I refer to are merely feeders, and the routing has nothing to do with it, because it all has to go over that route anyway. Then if the interline arrangements are interfered with by reason of military necessity on the main line, what is to compensate the short line or the feeding lines?

Mr. WEBB. I can not very well conceive how a short feeder line would be very material in transporting war material. If it is, it is the duty of the President to take it over.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Corn is a war material, and wheat and cattle and hogs are war materials. We could not conduct the war without them.

Mr. WEBB. I do not care to define what "war material" is. Therefore if you leave it to the President's judgment to take over any railroad that is of advantage in the conduct of the war, he will take over such line—the big lines and the small lines also. Why should we give him the discretion to take over such through lines as he thinks are necessary to the conduct of the war and compel him to take over the little lines, whether they are useful in the war or not?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Is it not the conclusion that the diversion of traffic made necessary for war purposes might act in the nature of a tying up, as an artery is sometimes tied up, for instance? That would prevent their having any circulation of traffic at all.

Mr. WEBB. In that event the President could take over the short-line railroads. If it hauls a sufficient amount of war material to make important the movement of its freight for war purposes, it ought to be taken over.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. No. On the contrary, if it were permitted to continue its existing traffic arrangements with a through system it would support itself, but if that traffic is diverted it would have little or no freight. Many of these short lines do not originate much traffic and do not themselves deliver traffic at the terminals. They are little links or little parts not yet swallowed up in the larger systems. Now, if the traffic on the main line is diverted by military necessity, it amounts to a tying up of this artery and thus stopping the circulation. There are many lines that are not a part of a main system. They do not lead to a terminal.

Mr. WEBB. The gentleman would not want to starve out a whole community by not running the trains.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. They might be deprived of earning their fair share of transportation income, because perhaps there would be no traffic of importance subsequently that could be sent over their line for reasons of geography. You can not force any or all traffic over them regardless of its destination.

Mr. WEBB. When a diversion of freight from a short-line road will relieve the emergency, then it is the duty of the Director General when the emergency is over to route freight over that short-line railroad in sufficient amount to compensate it for the loss of business while relieving the emergency.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. But there are roads that are feeders, as has been said, and there are people who have their money invested in them, and they do not want to see them go out of business.

Mr. WEBB. After the emergency is over enough freight will be routed over that little road to pay it back for the loss it has incurred on account of the emergency.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. But there may not be enough traffic that must or can go over that road in order to reach the destination.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. Referring to the gentleman's statement, to the effect that some short lines operate only a part of the year and therefore can be put out of business, we might just as well put out of business the Erie Canal, for example, because it runs only seven months in the year.

Mr. WEBB. I do not look for emergencies lasting seven months. If the emergency arises by which the public must be relieved by the rerouting of freight, nobody would stand in the way of the rerouting in the emergency; but I can not see an emergency lasting more than a few days or a few weeks, and if the Director General is directed to reroute enough traffic over that little road to compensate it for the loss I do not see how that road will be damaged.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON].

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, the provisions of this bill should be fair to all the railroads, to the short-line roads as well as to the trunk lines and transcontinental lines. This amendment should receive the approval of the committee for the reason that section 9, which attempts to provide for the short-line railroads, does not make definite or certain what short-line railroads will or may be taken over by the Government. Section 9 does not at all provide adequately or fairly for short-line roads.

The short-line railroads are the ones that for the most part have been promoted by local capital. They are the pioneers in railroad building. They are the ones that reach out into sparcely settled regions and develop new sections of the country. I do not believe that anything should be placed in this bill or that anything should be left out of the bill that would tend to destroy short-line railroads. The taking over of the large trunk-line systems of the country will as a matter of fact disarrange the money market and make it impossible for many of these short-line railroads to finance themselves. If they are not taken over by the Government on an equal basis with the other lines, a great injury and injustice will be done to most of them. The provision in section 9 of this bill does not at all take care of the situation that these short lines will have to meet.

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NORTON. Certainly.

Mr. DECKER. I want to ask the gentleman a question, if he has the time to spare?

Mr. NORTON. All right if the gentleman will make it brief.

Mr. DECKER. Well, I wish you would point out how by taking them under Federal control you give them a chance to finance themselves?

Mr. NORTON. It will do that in the same way that the taking over of the trunk line roads by the Government will stabilize and strengthen their financial condition. It will insure at least a fixed and definite minimum operating income for these short lines.

Mr. DECKER. What part of the bill, if you take them over, will give them a fixed income?

Mr. NORTON. What part of the bill?

Mr. DECKER. Yes.

Mr. NORTON. The bill provides that the railroads shall be guaranteed by the Government an annual operating income equal to the average annual income for the years 1915, 1916, and 1917. All I want to do is to put the short-line railroads on at least as favorable a basis as the trunk lines. This in justice should be done for them. If we are going to take over the railroads of the country, I believe we ought to take over these short lines. Further than this, I am not only in favor of the taking over of the railroads by the Government during the war, but I am also in favor of the Government taking over the permanent ownership and control of all the railroads of the country.

I have carefully studied the provisions of section 9 of the bill, and I know they are not fair to the short-line railroads owned by farmers in many sections of the country. The amendment that has been offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] that these lines be taken over is a fair, reasonable, and just provision.

Mr. ROMJUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NORTON. Certainly.

Mr. ROMJUE. Does not the gentleman think that if the short lines were not taken over, and at the conclusion of the war the railroads were released and turned back to their private operations, a great injustice would result to the short-line roads, and that they would be put practically at the mercy of the larger railroads of the country?

Mr. NORTON. Many of the short-line roads in that event would be completely bankrupted. We would likely have few short-line roads left at the conclusion of the war. The country would not have the benefit of the competition these short lines give us to-day. It would lose the benefit of many lower rates of transportation brought about by the operation of the short lines.

Mr. ROMJUE. And will they not be placed at the mercy of the larger railroads of the country?

Mr. NORTON. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ESCH. I yield five minutes to Gov. SANDERS, of Louisiana, a member of the committee.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, there are 30,000 miles of short-line railroads in America. Those 30,000 miles have outstanding in the neighborhood of $2,000,000,000 of securities. If these lines are not taken over under this bill it practically means bankruptcy for them. The amendment that has been spoken of by the gentleman from North Carolina was put into the bill at the suggestion of the short lines, but it was in no way agreeable to them. It was considered to be the best that could be gotten from the committee. Every representative of the short lines who appeared before our committee was in favor of those lines being taken over by the Government. It is true that they objected to the remuneration offered, but every one of them stated that unless they were taken over by the Government and were treated fairly it meant bankruptcy for them. And that is easily understood, gentlemen of the committee, because if we have in this Nation two systems of roads, one controlled and run by the Government, the great trunk lines, and the other, the short lines, controlled and run by private individuals, it simply means that there will be no freight routed over the short lines, and it means that the Government in taking over the trunk lines will have taken from the short lines their means of sustenance. To-day all the freight that the short lines get is obtained through solicitation. If the Government controls and operates the trunk lines, the Government will route the freight as the Government sees fit, irrespective of any solicitation. There is not a trunk line to-day in America but what has been made up of short lines. The short line is the pioneer. The men who build the short line gamble with the future. They risk their money, and often, in fact, almost universally lose their money, but it goes to the upbuilding of the community, and the short lines joined together ultimately become the trunk line. It is therefore absolutely essential for the future development of transportation in this country that the short line be not starved to death, but that that line be fostered and taken care of by the people. Now, if the Government is taking the place of railroad management, the Government itself ought to take over the short lines, just the same as the Government is taking over the trunk lines. There can be no question but what if this Government takes over the short lines as it has taken over the trunk lines it will not only save the short lines from bankruptcy, but it will benefit the country. I wish to call your attention to the fact that when the Government took over the great lines by the same order it took over every short line; and when these gentlemen appeared before our committee they stated that they were in the position of Mahomed's coffin, being neither in the heavens nor on the earth, that they were suspended in midair. They had been taken over by the order of the Director General. They exhibited their orders to the committee, and yet they stated that they did not know whether they were a component part of the national system or whether they would be put into the discard.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, in view of the time occupied by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH], and in view of the fact that Gov. SANDERS, a member of the committee, used no time in the general debate, I feel that I ought to yield to him five minutes, which I accordingly do.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. If we have this double-barreled system of roads in this country, and then if we go further in the bill and adopt a double-barreled system of rate making, we will then have this condition confronting us: The great lines will be controlled by the Government, the rates will be fixed by the President, the little lines will be controlled by their owners, and their freight rates will be fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNER. The gentleman is making a most illuminating statement; but I want to make this suggestion to him, that what he says may occur will absolutely occur if the provisions of this bill are carried out, because the provisions of this bill give the power to the President to make rates in reference to those roads that are taken over.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. No one knows that better than myself, and no one has fought harder against that in the committee than myself.

Mr. TOWNER. So there will be two systems.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. There is bound to be what I designate as a double-barreled system of roads and of rate making. I contend, gentlemen of the committee, that every single, solitary mile of rail in the United States is a component part of our transportation system. [Applause.] And every little road, no matter where that road is situated, no matter what it hauls, every road in America is to-day hauling war material, for this reason: Wars are no longer fought by armies. Wars are fought by a people, organized and efficient for that purpose; and the little road that hauls wheat hauls war material, and the little road that hauls lumber hauls war material, and every one of these short lines to-day are transporting war material that goes to make up the efficiency of this Nation; and every single, solitary mile of railroad in America ought to be taken over under this bill, ought to be administered as a whole, ought to have the Government's arm around it; and I call your particular attention to this, that no harm can come to the Treasury of the United States by taking over these short lines, for the reason that their remuneration is fixed in the bill.

The trunk line, if you please, has a handsome return under this bill. The short line will get practically nothing except the strong arm of the Government around it, to see it through this crisis, and see that it is not robbed of its means of sustenance during this time of war.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. I will.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I concur with what the gentleman has so forcibly stated, but I wish to call his attention to the fact that as the amendment is drawn the feeders which constitute the largest portion of the short lines would not be included.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. I can not agree with that construction, and if it does not, then it ought to be because my contention is that every mile of railroad in this country constitutes the transportation system by rail of this country. It ought to be coordinated, each mile with the other, and then it ought to go further than that, every mile of navigable waters in this Nation ought to be coordinated with every mile of railway transportation. [Applause.] Then when the rail and the water lines shall have been coordinated, and not until then, will we have a transportation system worthy of the name in America. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DECKER].

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I wish to say that I most heartily indorse the sentiments and expressions of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SANDERS] than whom there is no abler man on the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and, in my judgment, it will not be long before he will be recognized as one of the ablest in this legislative body. [Applause.]

But I hope the distinguished gentleman will not call it presumption on my part if I point out to him in a brief way that this amendment which is proposed here in no way reaches the object which he seeks. What he said relative to the short-line railroad owners coming before our committee is true, but I think the distinguished gentleman will bear me out that I was one of the first members of the committee who, in defense, took up the cudgel in their behalf. I did it for the very reason stated by the distinguished gentleman from Louisiana, because I felt that every means of transportation in this country should be coordinated and, as far as possible, utilized, and I thought that the Treasury of the United States and the people of the United States were strong enough to bear the burden, if burden there be.

In opposing this amendment I want it understood that I do not oppose it on the ground that we owe nothing to these short-line railroads. I do not indorse the sentiment of the distinguished Secretary of the Treasury, to wit, that in time of war we take only the stalwart men and leave the cripples, and therefore in time of war we take the strong railroads and leave the weak ones. The difference in that argument is that we take the strong men and leave the cripples, but we do not injure the cripples when we leave them. All we want in this bill is some method, if it can be devised, to not injure the railroads that are left and not taken over.

I want to point out that this amendment does not better their condition very materially, and, in fact, I have some grave doubts if it benefits them at all. True, the amendment is worded so that they can be taken over and shall receive all the "benefits under the bill," but I have not heard anybody yet state what specific benefits they will get under the bill as now drawn.

The reason I voted for the amendment we put in the bill, section 9, to leave them as they are, but not to interfere with the traffic arrangements, was because it was agreed to by the presidents of the short-line railroads, whose representative, a very able man and who seemed to be a fair man, came before our committee at the time they thought they were being taken over, as has been stated, and what he objected to was that under the provisions of the bill as then written, and as it is now written, there was no method to pay them what they thought they were entitled to, or a sufficient amount even to keep them out of bankruptcy.

Now, you gentlemen who are interested in the short-line railroads, I want you to listen to me a minute, because although I may not be as able as these men, I think I have a point that you should consider and perhaps can work out better than I can. They came before our committee and said: "Your standard return provides only for railroads that have been getting an income during the last three years. Almost every short-line road that came before our committee by representatives stated that—that for one reason or another they had not been making anything, or, at the most, very little, during the last three years, and what they objected to was that there was no provision in the bill to give them anything except at the end of a very expensive and tedious lawsuit.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DECKER. I will.

Mr. TOWNER. I was going to suggest to the gentleman that at that time they were not aware of the provision in the bill that was afterwards inserted, as I understand it, giving the President the power to take care of exceptional cases.

Mr. DECKER. I was just coming to that, and I am glad the gentleman mentioned it. It is a very pertinent question. In my opinion that in nowise betters conditions.

This is the section to which the gentleman from Iowa referred, and I want you to pay particular attention to it:

> If the President shall find that the condition of any carrier was during all or a substantial portion of the period of three years ended June 30, 1917, because of nonoperation, receivership, or any undeveloped or abnormal conditions, so exceptional as to make the basis of earnings hereinabove provided for plainly inequitable as a fair measure of just compensation, then the President may make with the carrier such agreement for such amount as just compensation as under the circumstances of the particular case he shall find just.

But the man who wrote the bill, Mr. ANDERSON, pointed out to us that it in no way, according to his judgment, changed the situation, because let no man deceive himself, neither the President of the United States nor the Director General is going to say to a railroad that has not been receiving anything for the last three years, "I will give you 6 per cent or 3 per cent or 10 per cent" without some careful and painstaking investigation to find some reason why they should be paid anything; and the investigation that will be required under this paragraph of section 1 will be just as tedious, just as painstaking, just as productive of delay as is provided in section 3, that gives them the right to have the referees, and so forth; and, in my humble opinion, your amendment holds forth a promise to the short-line railroads, but it will do them no good in the end, because the benefits of this bill, which you promise to them when you say, "We will take you over," simply means to give them the right to go into court and show that the Government of the United States should pay them for railroads that have not been making any money. That is all that is in the bill. I am the friend of the short lines and I have fought their fight since the beginning of this discussion in the committee, and unless you do something along the line of what the men who came before our committee wanted, I do not think that you will do them any good. They said this, in substance, "We have only been running two years," and another would come in and say that they had just gotten out of the hands of a receiver; another would come in and say they had been running a long time, but that they had just been reorganized two years ago, and they said, "You have taken us over"—they thought they had been taken over—and they said, "Pay over a certain per cent on our indebtedness, and that is all that we will ask." In other words, they said, "If we owe $500,000,000 or $1,000,000 of bonds, or if we have bonds out to that amount, pay the interest on the bonds until the war is over, and that is all we ask."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. DECKER. I will ask the gentleman to yield me a little more time. I just want to finish this thought.

Mr. SIMS. I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. DECKER. So now, do not deceive yourselves, and, for Heaven's sake, do not deceive the short-line people; do not say to them, "We are going to give you the benefits of the bill" when there are no benefits in it for them. You say that it will stabilize their finances and allow them to issue more securities. Do you mean by that that you want the President of the United States to buy the securities of these short-line railroads that have not been making any money under their own management? If you do, say so, and do not put the burden upon the President of the United States and then whine about it afterwards and say that he has extravagantly managed the railroads of the country. Say what you mean. If during this crisis you mean to pay the short-line railroads of this country a certain per cent on their indebtedness, if you authorize the President of the United States to purchase securities which they feel that they have to issue during the struggle, then say so, but do not put the burden on the President of the United States and then say, "You squandered the people's money and Government control is a failure."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DECKER. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman, of course, knows that there is a war-finance corporation being organized, and the report upon that bill will soon be in the House from the Committee on Ways and Means, which authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury, as the Pooh Bah of the Nation, to spend $500,000,000 and create $4,000,000,000 more of indebtedness for the purpose of buying securities of the railroads, maintaining the standard of all corporations that he may see fit to favor, and it will include these railroads, and it ought to include the short lines as well as the trunk lines.

Mr. DECKER. If it includes them, it would include them as much out of Government control as under Government control, so there is nothing to that. The point I make is this: Decide for yourselves what is best for them, because this amendment we put in the bill was written by the head of the short-line organizations, and they simply say, "If you can not pay us a stipulated interest upon our indebtedness, then, for Heaven's sake, during the war do not interfere with our traffic arrangements," and we have put into the bill that their traffic arrangements shall not be interfered with except by war materials; and let me call your attention to the fact that if the President of the United States wants to ship war materials over these roads he will undoubtedly take them over of his own initiative. The question you have got to decide is whether it is not better to let these railroads struggle along as they have in the last three years without making any money under their own management, and fight through themselves, than to put them under the Government control, put them into the courts of the country, which you will do unless you put a provision in the bill that the Government will pay the interest upon their indebtedness while the war is going on.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DECKER. Yes.

Mr. NORTON. The amendment provides that their average income for the last three years shall be guaranteed by the Government.

Mr. DECKER. What amendment?

Mr. NORTON. The amendment that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] offered. It puts them upon the same basis. The amendment itself does not contain those words, but if debated and made a part of the bill, it puts those roads on the same basis as the trunk lines.

Mr. DECKER. That is very true, but they are not in the same position as the trunk lines, because they can not get the benefit of the standard return which they have not been making themselves.

Mr. NORTON. If they made a return it guarantees that that return will be made by the Government to them.

Mr. DECKER. If they have been making returns during the last three years, then they are not in a very bad fix if you let them alone and guarantee that the traffic arrangements will not be interfered with.

Mr. NORTON. That is the point. They are not in a bad fix, but they are very likely to be if the Government takes over every trunk line and leaves them out and that is just what the short lines are complaining of.

Mr. DECKER. I am pointing out——

Mr. NORTON. The gentleman does not seem to get the point.

Mr. DECKER. The gentleman does not seem to get this point—and I wish to speak respectfully—the gentleman does not get the point that to put these short-line railroads under Government control and before they can get compensation from the Government require them to go into court and submit to a tedious lawsuit is not better for them than leaving them as they are now.

Mr. NORTON. I do not think that presumption will be taken at all.

The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, all of us are pleased, I am sure, when the gentleman from Missouri addresses the House, and I think he has offered some suggestions that show that he is very nearly in accordance with those in favor of taking care of the short lines. Now, I agree with the gentleman from Missouri that as this amendment stands it is not sufficient, and I hope and understand an amendment will be offered that will not only include all competing short lines, but also include all of those short lines that are engaged in general transportation, and that ought to be done. Of course there are some short-line railroads built for special purposes that are not engaged in general transportation, and these should not be taken over. But if they are engaged in general transportation, in my judgment they ought to be included under the President's order.

I agree also with the gentleman that in all probability, if this amendment be adopted, some amendment ought to be made to the provision of the bill which allows the President to take care of any exceptional case of railroads that are not otherwise provided for in the way of remuneration. Of course, gentlemen, this is temporary, but it is a question that involves not only the needs and the necessities of the Government, but also the most important economical interest of the people of the United States. The Government can not take over the railroads of the United States exclusively for war purposes. Gentlemen say, why should the Government take over any road that is not to be used for war purposes? No railroad can be taken over for war purposes only. The general transportation business of the country must be carried on, and it must be carried on principally on the railways which the Government will take over. Every railroad that the Government takes over is a part of the general system of transportation in this country.

Gentlemen have talked as if a system of transportation was something that must be limited to two or more roads. Why, no. The words "system of transportation" means even a 10-mile short-line railroad, because that is a system of transportation. You can speak of the entire railway system of the United States and say it is a system of transportation, and that is proper. The words "systems of transportation" used in the act were not limited and were not intended to be limited to railroads alone. The phrase includes all the systems of transportation, by water as well as land. And so when the President takes over these roads in order to do justice to the people he should be regardful not only of war interests and necessities—which are supreme, and when they are called into exercise all other powers must yield and all other interests—but he must regard also the rights and the interests of 100,000,000 of the people who are interested in every system of transportation in this country. They are all locked together. The short-line railroad, as we call it, only means that a particular section of track and the particular cars and equipment are under the control and management of a corporation operating a single-unit system. You will find, however, at some place that it is interlocked in some other system of transportation. At some place their cars are switched onto other tracks and connection is made that takes the commodities from the short lines to the trunk lines and so to the great marts of trade all over the land. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman from Wisconsin to use the time to which he is entitled so as to make it even.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN].

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I favor this bill, and I am heartily in favor of this amendment, the Esch amendment, the same as the amendment put on in the Senate. It is true, as stated by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB], that the short-line railroads did ask for the little pittance that is shown here in section 9, but it is further true that they asked more than that, which the committee that considered this bill could not put in. What will be the result if this war lasts three years and the short-line railroads are not cared for under the terms of this bill? When this war is over, according to my conception, the short-line railways would be in a state of bankruptcy. If they are not cared for in this bill, they can not go to the banking institutions and trust companies and borrow money either on their notes or on their bonds. If they are not properly guarded under this bill, these roads will all be in the hands of receivers, and these 30,000 miles of railways, made up of short lines, that owe $2,000,000,000 would be in a state of bankruptcy, and the communities through which they travel would suffer in like proportion. The farmers and little industrial enterprises along the lines would be greatly injured and hampered. My contention is that the Government of the United States should do the same to the weak as it does to the strong. Is it possible that this Congress proposes to take care of the great trunk lines of this country and allow the short lines to perish and dwindle for the lack of sustenance?

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. I will yield.

Mr. LAZARO. Is it not true that a perfect transportation system of this kind could be compared with the circulatory system of the human body, and would it not be ridiculous to attempt to have a perfect system of circulation to take care of the large arteries and large veins without taking care of the small arteries, the small veins, and the capillaries of the body?

Mr. QUIN. Why, it would be considered nonsense to take care of the large arteries and large veins and neglect the small arteries and small veins; and yet certain people believe that you ought to allow all of the lesser portions of the body of American railways to perish and starve. Under this bill as it is drawn, the short-line railways, when this war comes to a termination, will be in a condition of bankruptcy and the communities that they serve will have suffered in like proportion. Who is there here that would like to see the little short railroads—the feeders to the main arteries of commerce—destroyed, and the rails removed, and the stockholders left penniless, and the patrons left destitute of transportation facilities? The weak and humble should be guaranteed the same protection as the strong and powerful.

According to my contention, this Government ought to so conduct its transportation facilities during this war, and all its other business, so that when it comes out of the war we will have a great, strong, athletic commercial giant with which we will be ready to meet the exigencies of the Nation. You can not do that unless all of these short lines are properly cared for the same as the main trunk lines of this country are cared for. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN].

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH], and I trust it will be adopted. If it is necessary to modify the amendment, I trust the change will be in the spirit in which the original amendment is drawn.

The Senate has just concluded consideration of this bill, practically the same as the bill now before the House, and in reading the debates in the Senate one is assisted in understanding the bill, what it is intended to do, and what it will do, and assisted also in arriving at the proper construction of some of its principal features.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] a few moments ago spoke of a meeting he had with gentlemen from his State who are interested in short-line roads and of the draft of an amendment which was incorporated in the bill and now appears in it, which he said was quite——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman permit the Chair to call his attention to the rule, and it is probably the duty of the Chair to do so—although I do not know that any harm will be done in this particular case—that it is in violation of the rules of the House to refer to statements actually made on the floor of the Senate by Senators?

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I simply wish to call attention to the actual situation as it developed in the other body, and to a statement made by the distinguished Senator upon this particular point. I was making no reflection upon him, nothing that could cause any controversy or ill feeling. I certainly was not criticizing. I did not know that I was transgressing the rules and certainly had no intention of doing so.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood, of course, that the gentleman was not speaking in any criticism, but it seems it is the duty of the Chair to take the initiative in calling attention to the fact that references can not be made in debate to statements actually made on the floor of the Senate by Senators without reference as to whether it is controversial or not.

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I was referring to something that appeared in the RECORD, and practically quoting a statement by a Member of another body. I regret that I have transgressed the rules.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. I just asked permission to interrupt you in order to state that the representatives of the short-line railroads in the State from which the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] comes and in part represents were not satisfied with section 9, but considered it was the best they could get from that committee; and they are heartily in favor of this amendment.

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Michigan. That is what I wished to bring out. In answer to what the distinguished gentleman says now and in answer to what the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] said, and that this amendment was urged in another body, because of what had been incorporated in this bill and thought at the time it was framed was sufficient, it seemed to me that the deliberations of the body, the conclusions they had reached, their arguments and reasons, would be helpful to the House in considering this amendment. The amendment now pending, offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH], is in the same words as the Cummins amendment, adopted yesterday by the Senate; adopted because section 9 of the House bill was not considered as sufficient protection to small roads.

Now, the taking over of the railroads by the Government of the United States is not to be entirely in the interest or for the benefit of the Government alone, and, as has been well said by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], they can not be taken over entirely for war purposes and all other considerations eliminated. It seems to me that we can get help in the consideration of matters of this kind by knowing and keeping in mind some of the things that have been done in England respecting the general manufacturing situation in that country. There has been an effort, which has met with marked success, to keep general business going, to keep it prosperous and successful, as is shown, in one way, by the very large imports from that country, larger than ever before, indicating that the general business of the country is in good shape. So in this country, as far as possible, business should be protected and encouraged even if it is not directly a part of war preparation or absolutely necessary to enable us to prosecute the war. Certainly, the general business of the country ought not to be deliberately injured or sacrificed as would inevitably be the result of excluding small railroads from such benefits as may result from this act. If not included, the small roads will be discriminated against and embarrassed and many of them will be ruined.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] use any of his time?

Mr. SIMS. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. SIMS. I have just been informed that he has been called out of the Chamber, and I ask that the gentleman from Wisconsin use more of his time.

Mr. ESCH. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SNOOK], a member of the committee.

Mr. SNOOK. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I will ask not to be interrupted in the time that I have allotted me.

I regret very much to be compelled to take the position of opposing the position of the distinguished chairman of our committee, because I respect his judgment very much, as much as any man in the House, but I feel it my duty to support this amendment. And I want to give briefly the reasons. This question was before our committee and was gone into quite fully at the hearings. I have never heard but one argument, and there has been but one argument before the committee, why the short-line railroads should not be taken over, and the only argument offered was that it would entail a very large expenditure on the part of the Government, larger than the Government could afford to make.

Now, I am convinced, after giving the question thorough and careful study, that this would not be the result of the adoption of this amendment. I was asked a great many questions upon this very point when I had the honor of addressing the House during general debate, and I propounded the query then as to whether or not the Government could afford to do it. Since then, after giving the subject careful thought, I am convinced that the good to be obtained from following this course will outweigh the cost. There are many short-line railroads that have built up towns along their lines and that serve large communities. To discontinue those lines or to cripple their use would mean disaster to the towns and communities they serve.

There are three ways under this bill by which the railroads taken over can be compensated. The first is under the standard return, which is equivalent to what the railroads have earned in the last three years. If any of these roads is compensated under that provision it certainly can not hurt the Government, as the pay will be on the same basis with a majority of the roads.

The other provision is that they can go into the courts and have the amount of the compensation they should receive determined, and of course that would be the fair rental value of the road; and certainly the Government would not be harmed if that theory were put into effect.

The other method, to which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] alluded, is that allowing the President or the Director General to censor the case and fix the compensation. That is the exceptional one, and of course it goes without saying that the President would not give compensation to any of these roads if they were taken over that would materially embarrass the Government. So I think that it may well be said that the expenditure on the part of the Government would not be such as to embarrass the Government; and this meets the only argument that was brought before the committee as to why these railroads should not be taken over.

It is said that this amendment does not go far enough, that it does not reach the railroads. I am inclined to think that it goes far enough, because under the language of this amendment there is not a railroad, however short, but has a junction with some other railroad, and in one way or another competes with some other railroad for business, and therefore it would reach all these railroads.

Another argument is that the taking over of these railroads under this provision would not do them any good. I can not see anything in that argument. When the railroads were taken over by the President, immediately the stock market and the values of the securities of those railroads reflected that action, and if these railroads are taken over with the others it will have the same effect on the short lines, on the small railroads, that it has had on all the other railroads of the country.

It will have a tendency to stabilize their securities and give them an opportunity in this way to meet their obligations as they accrue. For this reason I think the amendment should prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it seems to me that the primary consideration for a proper understanding and vote upon this amendment is to look into the elemental purposes of this bill. As stated in the caption of the bill, the purposes are "to provide for the operation of the transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes."

Now, admittedly there would have been no necessity for legislation of this drastic character except for the reason that the developments of the transportation system under war conditions under private ownership apparently, to a large extent, broke down, so to speak, and as I understand the purposes of this bill from the standpoint of the Government interests it is to unify and coordinate for Government needs and necessities such elements of our transportation system as are necessary to the successful and speedy carrying out of the war purposes of the country. I realize, of course, that there are a great many short-line railroads in the United States that have, according to the arguments that have been made here, a direct interest in the result of this legislation.

But, gentlemen, it seems to me that in order to arrive at the correct conclusion regarding the equity and merits of this proposition the status of these short-line railroads should be considered on the basis of their real earning capacity and carrying capacity as common carriers. You take an ordinary short-line railroad, used for the purpose of developing a certain limited section of the country, and necessarily it has some trunk-line terminal—that is, most of them have—and you take the lumber and wheat and iron ore or any other of the other necessary commodities that are required for the use of the public and the Government at this time, produced upon the territory covered by any short-line carrier, and they necessarily have to be transported by some route to their legitimate market, and therefore they would have to be carried, in its last analysis, to the larger consuming market by trunk lines, and these trunk-line railroads will inevitably be taken over under the provisions of this bill. On the other hand, in taking short-line railroads that do not furnish any product for foreign markets or a distant market there is no requirement from the standpoint of governmental necessity for taking over short-line roads of that character. Therefore it will be remitted, as under ordinary circumstances, to its actual earning capacity as a short-line carrier.

It seems to me, gentlemen of the committee, that the elemental considerations of the bill that is before us, as presented in this section and in other sections of the bill, are to conserve to the utmost all the necessities of the Government and not to give attention to the stabilizing and guaranteeing of the securities of short-line railroads. The purposes of the bill, as it was conceived and in the arguments made in favor of its passage in the first instance, were based on the developments and the facts which tended to show that it was necessary to coordinate or take over under Government control the really needed transportation facilities of the country, and not every element of the railroad systems of the country that might not be needed for that purpose.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. The necessities, of course, were first considered on account of the war needs?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. And it can not be said that the short lines are not hauling war material, because everything we use is in a sense war material.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It has to go to some fixed market. It is not to be conceived that the Director General would delay the shipment of war material over that short line, and therefore I do not think it will be necessary for the real purposes of this bill to take over all the short-line carriers and thereby tremon-dously and unnecessarily increase the burdens of the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am sorry that I can not further answer the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Alabama.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am heartily in favor of this amendment. This is war legislation, and the communities dependent on short-line railroads are entitled to the protection that people on the longer roads are to have under the provisions of this bill.

There is a short-line railroad in Lowndes County, in my district, about 20 miles long. It joins the Louisville & Nashville Railroad leading into Montgomery, Ala. This short road is located in one of the greatest agricultural counties in the country, and over the protest of the people of the county, people who gave the right of way and timber for making crossties, this short-line road has been sold for junk and is being torn up and shipped away.

Those who owned the road have disregarded the interests of the public and they are depriving that territory of the services of this road, which were very useful in carrying farm produce to Montgomery and to Camp Sheridan. I think it is right and just that the Government should cover these roads into this bill, so that the communities that have these short-line roads will be assured that these roads, so useful and necessary to them, will not be put out of business and torn up and sold for junk during this war

The stockholder in the short-line road is entitled to the same character of protection that the stockholder in the big railroad is to have under the provisions of this bill; and as a matter of right the people living in communities served by the short-line railroads are entitled to the same character of consideration and protection that the people living on the long lines are to have under this bill. It is unfair to aid and safeguard the big railroads in these strenuous times of war and leave the little roads unaided and helpless in the hands of those who want to put them out of business. [Applause.]

Mr. ESCH. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL].

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I favor this amendment for the fundamental reason that it avoids the perpetration of an injustice. I regret the necessity for the taking over of the railroads in this emergency, but if it was necessary to take over any, it is equally necessary to take over all. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SANDERS] is undoubtedly correct in that proposition. Within this limited time I can give only two reasons: First, there is not a short-line railroad in the United States which in the carrying of freight and passengers does not prorate with railroads of greater length. It is absolutely necessary for their existence that they should give through bills of lading for the movement of traffic initiated over their own lines, and thence over other railroad systems, which under this act will be under the jurisdiction of the President of the United States, and it is unfair that the President should have the control of rates over the long systems of railway and these short-line railroads deprived of whatever benefit may accrue from the operation of this law.

In addition they ought to be included for their financial preservation. Many of them have bonds maturing during the existence of this law. They are deprived of credit by reason of the conditions of war, emphasized by the existence of this law which we are considering, and they ought to be protected.

Then there is another reason. While the Government in the exercise of certain prerogatives as a sovereign may do certain things such as we are proposing to enable it to do under this law, it is not in consonance with our institutions that the doing of anything by the sovereign should work an injustice to any other person or property, and we are doing a thing here by the passage of this law which will work that injustice, and therefore is fundamentally wrong.

Mr. WEBB. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. I yield to the gentleman if I have the time.

Mr. WEBB. Referring to the gentleman's last statement, will he tell us how an injustice is going to be done these short-line railroads in view of section 9 of the bill?

Mr. SMALL. Section 9 of the bill simply places it in the power of the President to let shippers route their shipments, provided the exigencies of the Government do not require the President or the Director General himself to do so. That does not protect these short railroads from the injustice which will be done them unless this amendment is adopted.

Mr. ESCH. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry before I begin.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Is this the proper time to offer an amendment to the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can offer an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment to the amendment. The Chair requests the attention of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. Did the gentleman from Wisconsin send his amendment to the desk to be offered?

Mr. LENROOT. That was my intention.

The CHAIRMAN. If that is the case, of course the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] would take precedence in being offered before the amendment to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I accept the amendment offered by my colleague [Mr. LENROOT].

The CHAIRMAN. It will have to be reported and acted upon by the committee, of course.

Mr. LENROOT. On the statement of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH], I am willing to withdraw my amendment for the present and to offer it later.

The CHAIRMAN. It has not been offered yet. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized to offer an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. GREEN of Iowa offers the following amendment to the amendment: After the words "possession, use, and control," insert the words "or which is engaged as a common carrier in the transportation of material, food, fuel, or supplies used in or necessary for carrying on the war."

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the committee very particularly to the fact that the original amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] would not include to exceed one-third of the short lines, if it took in that many. I have not made any computation, but I believe I am safe in saying that fully two-thirds, and I think probably four-fifths, of the short lines are merely feeders. They do not compete with any line, but simply supply the road into which all of their shipments are eventually turned. It has been said in argument that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH], which applies simply to roads that compete with the roads which the President shall take over under the provisions of this bill, would include all of these short lines, for the reason that these feeders to which I now refer always take freight which would have otherwise gone somewhere or somehow to some other line.

Perhaps that is true, but that is not the sense in which the word "competition" is ordinarily used, and I do not think it is the sense in which it would be applied if this amendment is added. So that as the amendment now stands, in my judgment it will take over only a very small portion of the short lines. The amendment which I have offered, which, if adopted, would make the amendment apply to all roads that carry food, fuel, material, or supplies for carrying on the war, would include practically every road, at least every road that ought to be included, because there are none of these short lines that I know anything about which act as common carriers that are not carrying some food, fuel, material, or supplies necessary for carrying on the war. Moreover, I do not think it was the intention when this amendment was originally prepared and adopted that it should include anything but those lines competing in the ordinary sense of the word.

Another reason why I think it would be construed in that manner is that all through the bill there runs this idea, which is further expressed in section 9, that the short lines which are to be considered in the bill are those which are affected by routing arrangements, where the freight might be routed over some other line. In such a case as that, of course, they would compete with the main line. I think this amendment must be adopted if we are to take over all the short lines.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FAIRFIELD].

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Chairman, as I see this program, there are three elements in it: The Government, the holders of the securities of the short lines, and beyond them the people who live along these lines. I think this amendment is a simple act of justice, for finally the Government is the people of this country.

I do not believe that we are prepared here to say that the exigencies of the war are so great that the Government can afford to take the chance of doing a great injustice. Some of these lines are barely able to subsist; some of them are already on the verge of bankruptcy. If they are not taken over, they will be destroyed and possibly junked.

A concrete example is a road 75 miles in length projected by a man and assisted by every community through which the road runs. It crosses two intersecting lines and has not yet reached its objective. That road is in danger to-day of being sold and junked. I suppose that a wise railroad financier might say let it be "junked" if it can not support itself. But remember that there are 800 such lines. There are 800 communities through which those lines run, and to do a thing now that would injure the life of these lines after the sacrifices that the people have made in their interest would be an injustice that I think the Government can not afford at this time. The farmers along the line of the road in many instances gave the right of way. Every town and township voted to tax itself that this road might be built. In every case the help rendered was absolutely gratuitous. No stock was issued to these farmers or towns or townships. The aid was not given for the purpose of realizing dividends on the stock, it was given that the road might be secured. Conditions are such now that the road can not be financed except by the Government. My only contention is that the property of the people should not be taken away from them, without hope of return, by any action of this Government; rather should it be the policy to conserve every mile of track and every bit of rolling stock on all the roads. The people along these short lines are helpless. They have sacrificed to build these roads; they need them. Business conditions are such that they can not organize a company now to protect themselves. All their money not immediately demanded in their own private business is being used for the purchase of liberty bonds and for subscriptions for Red Cross and Y. M. C. A. work. The Government ought to protect these roads by taking them over, operating them, and thus preventing a signal wrong to the communities through which the roads pass. [Applause.]

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL].

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for the bill with some amendments which I hope may be attached. America's contribution to the war is reduced to-day to a question of transportation. We must keep the vast supply arteries open, and through them must flow a steady stream of men and war material to the sea and across that unwilling conscript. Nothing must stand as an obstruction. If we as a nation at war find a time-honored institution too cumbersome for our present urgent necessity, supplant it with one more mobile to our needs.

Had the catastrophe of war not come to us we might have struggled through the growing pains of adaptation of an ill-fitting transportation system without so radical a remedy. But crises precipitate discontent that is in solution. The enormous burdens of mobilizing a nation for war brought into high light the inherent defects of our system. The roads were hampered by a division of authority. Pooling, a thing desirable when the needs of the Nation and not private gain are the aim, had been interdicted because of its abuse by the roads in times past. With their future uncertain the credit of the railroads did not warrant investment in new equipment. The rapacious vortex of war preparation was draining the world of finance of its wealth and the strain of the useless cost of competing organizations was too much for the country to stand. So that, while the railroads in the past have not unjustly been considered sinners above all Israel, because managers were unable to view transportation as a whole and persisted in seeing only their own lines; because they opposed water transportation on lake, river, and canal, and jealously planted terminals without regard to public need; because of stock manipulations, secret rebates, and railroad wreckers, the present condition is not one for which they are to be punished. This bill is not a retaliatory measure. The railroads need the Government as much as the Government needs to control the railroads. Waste must be eliminated, expense curtailed, and congestion relieved. Only under one head can the whole system coordinate and function with benefit to every part.

There is a remarkable unanimity throughout the Nation in following the President in his most radical departure from precedent. The rail heads, labor, the investors, and the people generally welcome it as a necessary war measure, that will quicken our Nation's efficiency for winning the war and make our resources mobile. Charles S. Mellen, formerly of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad, says:

> A single directing head will cut out the handling of thousands of empties one way, due to past competitive warfare. Freight will be shipped by the shortest route, without regard to which railroad benefits.

Theodore Shonts says that 60 per cent of labor and fuel in New York terminals will be saved by pooling. Already the Director General, by virtue of authority being lodged in a single head, has instituted direct routing regardless of earnings of railroads, suspended priority orders, and increased demurrage rates, thus hastening loading and unloading, none of which the railroads could do without permission of the War Board or the Interstate Commerce Commission, but which the Government under press of war necessity could instantly do. The success of the Government's war-time railroad policy will depend upon teamwork. Unless the present machinery, both labor and managers, cooperate, efficiency will be lost. We must employ and conserve, not antagonize and reject, the training and ability of the scientists in the railroad business. Their years of education are a Government asset. Every ounce of our financial strength must be applied. The Senate, ever generous at the taxpayers' expense, has taken good care that the railroads be well and sufficiently protected. It only remains that we should look equally well after the interests of the people who must pay the tremendous compensation suggested. The railroads are a part of the people; no longer are they a thing apart.

The people of this country are the ones who are making the supreme sacrifice. They have a right to safeguard. In the matter of compensation the railroads should receive fair and just return, but their service has not been so eminently satisfactory that they need a premium. If 4 per cent is enough for the poor who are patriotically handing over their little hoardings for the Government's liberty bonds, the railroads should be patriotically content to receive 8 per cent. And why pick out 1915, 1916, and 1917, when the last two were notably banner years, as a basis for compensation? Why the fattest years? Why not strike a middle course?

But at the same time we must avoid an unjust and arbitrary course. Who knows how Government control will work out after the war? As a permanent institution labor fears it might hamper their freedom; fears, too, lest the vicious workmen's so-called "compensation act" shall supplant the interstate-commerce act. Railroad heads regard it with disfavor. How the people will look upon it depends upon whether it shall degenerate into a dangerous, grafting, political, wasteful machine, a Scylla as much to be avoided as the Charybdis of selfish, narrow-visioned private ownership.

The question of how long the Government shall continue to operate the roads should be left open. The conditions of demobilizing will create just such difficulties as we are now experiencing. Reconstruction will face we can not conceive now what new problems. No one can say what definite period, if ever, will see the Nation restored to prewar conditions. It is essential that the period of control be sufficient to establish a permanent, far-reaching change adapted to the growing needs of our tremendous transportation problems. We should neither cut ourselves off permanently from the benefits of Government control, should that prove the consummation devoutly to be wished, nor should we so tie ourselves up that we can not substitute Government regulation, should that prove to be the better way. There is no vital necessity that this question should be settled at this time. The railroads are amply protected, the stock and bond holders equally so.

There is but one task before the least and greatest of this land, but one thought to hold, and that is win the war. Do your all to win the war; the administration says this is the way. If criticism helps, what difference whom it hurts; let it come. Perform the major operation and get on. If it will harm our cause, then the cure is worse than the disease.

The enemy we have to face is relentless, resourceful, rapacious, and united with a coherence that can only be overcome by an equal unity. That is the one terrific call to every one of us to-day. We can not in safety delegate our responsibility in this grave—this terrible crisis.

The American spirit has changed tremendously. It is back of any movement necessary to win. We are breaking, Gulliver like, the tiny fretting threads that well-meaning pacifists have wound about the giant limbs of the Nation. Our blunders, our failures are part of the cross that we must learn to bear. Cut red tape, the people back home are demanding, and forget politics and party. What do they care about political capital when the safety and well-being and lives of their best and dearest are at stake "over there"? What do they care which party wins the next presidential election when their hearts are set with the grim purpose to go over the top in our fight for the rights of humanity? We can't evade, we can't go round; we must go straight through. The poignant days of the war are just beginning. What we have irked at is but the sting of the gadfly. We are in war. That is the one tremendous fact. We must win it; every other consideration is subordinate. Now is the one time in all our history, if we are to persist as a nation, that we must merge personal ambition. We must forego political advantage. We must abandon our local squint and try to see with the larger vision of the Nation.

I am heartily in favor of the Esch amendment, which I believe necessary to do justice, and in connection with that point I wish to have read in my time a letter written to me by my friend and constituent, Col. Luce, who is now serving his country with his regiment in Texas and who is interested in a short-line railroad running from Minneapolis to Hutchinson.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the letter.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

FORT SAM HOUSTON, TEX., February 12, 1918.

Congressman THOMAS D. SCHALL,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I notice in the paper that Congress will bring up the railroad bill this week. There is no question as to the advisability of the Government taking over the railroads. If it had not, in all probability they would all be forced into bankruptcy. By congressional action salaries were greatly increased, cost of all labor doubled, fuel doubled, and all this without any material increase in rates. Evidently, with this given situation, it appears best to those in power in order to prevent financial disaster to the country's railroads and also those holding their securities to take them over with certain guaranties under present conditions. This is true of all railroads, big and small. The large railroad heads have been crying for relief, asking that something be done. Their prayer has been answered. If the big, strong railroads are in this condition financially, what shape do you expect to find the small ones in, especially those who are not fortunate enough to secure a partial handling of the immense Government business incident to the war. I do not think it is necessary for me to go further into detail as to the necessity of treating the large and small railroads alike.

I will bring to your attention a sample of the injustice if the small railroads are discriminated against. Between Minneapolis, Minn., and Hutchinson, Minn., the Great Northern, the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul, and the Electric Short Line each operate a line of railway. Under the proposed bill the Great Northern and Milwaukee roads will each be guaranteed a living by the Government, while the Short Line, because it is a small road, must be forced into bankruptcy. The small road serving its proportionate territory means just as much to the successful conclusion of the war as the large. The small investors in small roads have a right to ask for the same relief as the large ones. If more taxes are to be assessed to make up the loss in railroad operation under present conditions, the least the country can expect from Congress is that the laws shall be equitable to all railroads, both big and small.

As far as the undersigned is concerned, I am only too willing to serve my country in any capacity that I am asked in order to win this war. But in return, while I am deprived of attending to my personal business, I feel that it is only fair and just of Congress that in passing its law it shall treat the railroads alike and not discriminate against the small.

If the Government should protect the large and not the small roads, it will bring this state of affairs about: When the roads are turned back to the owners the large roads, all protected by the Government, will be in excellent shape physically as well as financially. The small roads, in the meantime, will be forced into bankruptcy and be on the market, so that the guaranteed roads will get them at a small per cent of their value.

Knowing that you will see the fairness of my argument and will do all you are able to see that all railroads are treated alike, I beg to remain,

Sincerely, yours,

ELECTRIC SHORT LINE RAILWAY,
E. D. LUCE, Vice President.

P. S.—I am speaking as a representative of 4,000 stockholders of the Electric Short Line Railway, all local people, 3,000 of them farmers.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, there is but little a man can say in two minutes. I can say this, however, that war is not the normal condition of mankind. It is an abnormal condition and we expect, as a normal people, after the war is over, to resume our ordinary occupations in the ordinary way. It is a very poor way to go about it if as one of the first steps of war we necessarily destroy $2,000,000,000 worth of wealth in our country. We ought to be able after the war is over to go back and set out with institutions practically the same as they were before we started the war, if we can. If it costs us $2,000,000,000 to keep the short-line railroads, at the end of the war, if we have the short-line railroads at a cost of $2,000,000,000, we would at least have the railroads. If we go ahead under this bill without the amendment, at the end of the war we will have lost $2,000,000,000 worth of wealth and have nothing to show for it.

I know something about the practical effect of the situation in my district. There is a short-line railroad 60 miles long running through my territory, built up with little towns along the way. There are no other railroad lines by which the people can ship. It runs through farming communities and to coal mines. At present it is so situated that it can not get a single car through the trunk lines of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy or the Rock Island. The people have had a hard struggle to get these roads. Many of these communities served by these little roads have labored for years to get these roads built as outlets for their products; they have invested their money in them. These roads ought not to be industrially destroyed. As my time is so short I can not now give my reason in greater detail. I am heartily in favor of this amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS].

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I listened to the argument of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DECKER], in the course of which he advanced the proposition that the short lines proposed to be taken over by this amendment, would not be benefited by that action. I failed to catch the force of his reasoning. The amendment provides that the short lines to which it relates shall be "held, and considered as within Federal control, as therein defined, and shall be entitled to the benefit of all the provisions of the act." Will the act be of any benefit to the trunk lines? If so, then the same benefits that will accrue to them, by virtue of its provisions, is secured for the short lines. The report which accompanies this bill declares that one of the purposes of this legislation is to provide for the operation of the trunk lines. It is a matter of great concern to many communities that the short lines shall be operated. This result is secured by the amendment.

Some of the gentlemen who oppose this amendment seem to be in a somewhat inconsistent position. Reading the argument of one Senator I find that although he believed and hoped that most of the short lines would be taken care of by the Government, he concluded his remarks with the declaration that he intended to vote against this amendment. Later he did vote against it. This gentleman, and all other gentlemen who hope and believe that these short lines will be taken over, ought to square their action with their hopes. A thing that I hope will be done, is a thing that I believe ought to be done. A thing that I believe ought to be done, is a thing worthy of my vote and support.

If there is anybody in this House who believes that these short lines ought to be taken over, presumably he holds to that view on the ground that such action will be in the public interests. Assuredly any action that the public interests require, is action that ought to be secured by appropriate legislation. There are a number of short lines in the country that serve a very useful purpose. They afford transportation facilities to many communities that are not reached by the great trunk lines. Their operation is as essential to the comfort, the convenience, and the prosperity of the communities which they serve, as are the great transportation systems to the country generally. Under the interstate commerce law the shipper enjoys the right to route the freight which he offers for transportation. This right has been taken from him, and the authority to divert the flow of traffic is now exercised by the Director General of Railroads. This bill proposes to finance the roads taken over, and furnishes a prodigious revolving fund to be used for maintenance, betterments and operating expenses of the vast trunk systems proposed to be taken over, but the trunk lines by no means constitute the entire railroad mileage of the country. There are over 30,000 miles of short lines, with an aggregate value of $1,000,000,000.

Many of these roads are owned by small companies, some by counties, others by individuals. They were constructed in most instances either to serve communities that were totally lacking in transportation facilities, or to afford relief against the exactions and oppressions of the trunk lines. It would be a national calamity for these lines either to be forced out of business entirely or to be turned over to receivers. These smaller lines may not be making money. In most instances they are not, but they are of incalculable value to the communities which they penetrate. Many small towns owe their existence to short-line roads. Withdraw their activities, and these towns will disappear. Take them from the agricultural communities which they now serve, and the shrinkage of values, and reduction of industries that will follow will be appalling. Are the people of these communities, are the busy workers in these little towns; less entitled to consideration than the men who live along the great transportation systems, or who rejoice in the opportunities of the great cities? If this is a question of Government ownership, the Government should take all the roads, great and small alike. If it is a question of Government operation in the general interests, then the Government should operate the great lines and the small lines alike, as one compendious whole, in the interest of the general public.

The needs of the country can not be adequately served by the trunk lines alone. The small feeders to these lines, so essential to the prosperity of the small towns, and country communities, should be maintained and operated as an integral part of a unified system. It is manifest that if the Government lavishes its benefits upon the trunk lines, and by routing orders, and traffic arrangements, maintains them at the highest level of activity and prosperity, in disregard of the needs of the short lines, the latter will languish and die. This may be a matter of small concern to the great centers of industry, to the mighty cities of our land fed by the great roads which deliver within their gates in unending stream the precious freights that come from the four quarters of the earth, but it is a matter of life and death, to the small towns, and country communities that are dependent in many cases upon these little roads to reach the markets of their choice. What is the controlling reason suggested by the administration for taking over the railroads at the present time?

It is to unify the system, to weld the competing roads into an efficient and harmonious whole, and thus fashion a more effective weapon with which to win the war. But this result will not be attained if the smaller lines are disregarded and administrative direction is confined exclusively to the great systems. The prosperity of the country rests upon an efficient coordinated system which will comprehend all of the roads, great and small alike, and afford the largest measure of transportation facilities to the entire country. The interests, the wants, the needs of the small communities, and of the little towns, must not be overlooked. To win the war, we need on the largest and most universal scale, solidarity of national sentiment. That solidarity will not be secured if the interests of the small communities are disregarded in this bill, and the gigantic funds which it appropriates, and the immense powers which it confers, are expended and exercised, solely in the interest of the great trunk lines. It is not enough to develop these lines for the transportation of coal, and steel, and guns, and munitions of war. There is a vast body of freight which is not distinctively war freight, but which must be moved in the interest of the general welfare and nation-wide prosperity. Our ability to wage this war depends upon that prosperity, a prosperity which can not be maintained unless every community is afforded the facilities which unified administration of existing agencies will supply. Take over the trunk lines, if need requires, but take over the short lines at the same time.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I would like to read to the House an order sent out by the Director General on January 9, 1918, to all railroad officers and employees of the railroads of our country:

DIRECTOR GENERAL OF RAILROADS,
INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION,
Washington, January 8, 1918.

To all railroad officers and employees:

The Government of the United States, having assumed possession and control of the railroads for the period of the present war with Germany, it becomes more than ever obligatory upon every officer and employee of the railroads to apply himself with unreserved energy and unquestioned loyalty to his work.

Every railroad officer and employee is now in effect in the service of the United States, and every officer and employee is just as important a factor in the winning of the war as the men in uniforms who are fighting in the trenches.

Through this order the Director General appeals to the railroad men of the United States to be patriotic, but at the same time he is going to discriminate against the short-line roads by saying to them, "You look after yourselves, but the Government will take care of the big fellows."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Did that letter go to the short-line presidents?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I understand it went to every railroad president in the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I shall support the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH], although it is true that under a hostile interpretation it would not perhaps take in some of the feeder lines, and under a too favorable interpretation it might take under Federal control lines that are not in any way necessary or essential or useful in the winning of the war but are in a bad way financially and anxious to be pulled out of the hole. If I were to approach this matter in the way of legislation I should suggest something of this kind. As evidenced by the President's order just read by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER], all of the railroads, big and little, are now under Federal control, and I should propose the following amendment:

That no railway lines shall be excluded from Federal control solely on the ground that the operation of such lines is not essential to the successful operation of the railways by the Federal Government, but any line which competes or connects with lines under Federal control and whose business will be seriously and disadvantageously affected by remaining under private control shall be taken under Federal control if such action is necessary to prevent loss or hardship through the taking over of connecting lines.

An amendment of that kind would clearly take in all going connecting, feeding, and competing lines, but it would exclude a line which was merely a strip of rust not affected by the general taking over of lines and of no value as a part of the railway systems of the country. It would accomplish, I think, rather better than the amendment proposed the object sought; but I shall support the amendment offered because I assume that in any event the bill will go to conference in a form that will make it possible to modify all of these provisions, and when we shall finally reach the point of handling the short lines I think they should be considered on the theory that I have suggested.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GOODWIN].

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, the hearings disclose, as I recall, that there are over 800 short-line railroads in this country, with a capitalization of over $1,200,000,000 and with a bonded indebtedness of over $800,000,000, embracing over 30,000 miles of short-line roads. These roads eventuate into trunk lines, many of them. I do not care to speak locally upon a great national question, but others have spoken in that way; and where many have spoken in a local way, then largely what they say represents the attitude of the Nation at large; and if I may be permitted to speak locally, I will say that not only in my immediate section but throughout the great Southwest there are many scores of short-line railroads which not only have become permanent trunk lines, but many of them to-day are in process of being converted and merged into permanent trunk lines. This, of course, is an extraordinary measure—a war measure, pure and simple. We have tried to put forth all of the energies and activities at our command to win the war. It is better to have one general management than many dozens in time of war; and under the authority of the Director General, he may divert traffic from these short-line roads which they in the past have enjoyed to the larger roads; and the small roads have had an uphill business to make tongue and buckle meet, to make a living; and now if, under the authority vested in the Director General to divert traffic from the short-line roads in order to make traffic as expeditious as possible, these roads which have enjoyed tonnage in the past may be deprived of a large part of that tonnage as long as the war lasts, and for the length of time that the roads are to be controlled by the Government after the war is over, then, as a matter of right, they should not be forced into insolvency, but should be put on an equal footing with the larger roads.

Therefore it follows, as night follows the day, if the short lines are discriminated against, if the traffic to which they would be justly entitled is diverted to the larger lines, that bankruptcy stares them in the face, and as a result, of course, in time they will have eventually been absorbed by the large trunk lines at their own price.

No one thing possibly has done more to develop many parts of the country than the short-line railroads, and in their wake towns have sprung up, markets have been opened, farming communities settled, and great sections that were once a wilderness, have become habitations prosperous with the thrift and energy of many thousands of people. To discriminate against these small roads, diverting much freight to the larger trunk lines, means bankruptcy for thousands of investors, insolvency for the short lines, and either their complete abandonment as carriers or their absorption by the large railroads at a nominal consideration.

Not only this, Mr. Chairman, but the operation of these short-line roads is indispensable not only to the communities through which they operate, but likewise to the country at large, if America is to put forth her full energies in transportation and otherwise in a successful prosecution of the war. For these roads are as veins to the larger arteries of the body; they are feeders to the transportation system of the whole country, and absolutely essential as carriers of traffic from thousands of farms and communities to the great commercial centers of the country. Take the sawmill roads alone; these in many cases are the only rail transportation that hundreds of communities have. Destroy them and you not only largely uproot the milling interests properly but you also put out of business many thousands of sawmill employees, who have never known any other business in life, who are wholly dependent on this character of work for a livelihood.

Again, Mr. Chairman, we are spending and charging up to the war many millions of dollars that ordinarily would not be considered as a war charge. Congress recently passed a bill carrying $50 000,000 to house the shipbuilders of the country. This was a charge on the war. Our policy as legislators should be to so conserve our resources that when the war is over we may again return as nearly as possible to our normal life and find conditions as nearly normal as possible, and with the thought always that we will not discriminate in favor of the strong and against the weak—not in favor of the great transportation systems of the country and unmindful of the small, struggling roads, that even now are barely able to breathe an existence, giving always equal and exact justice to all whom we call upon to serve or make a sacrifice. I am heartily in favor of the amendment, believing as I do that no injustice should be visited upon anyone and that upon the close of the war we may once more enter as nearly as possible upon our normal life, having always in mind the progress and evolution of our economic and social life.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, the pending amendment—it perhaps ought itself first to be amended—will receive my support. I am in favor of having the Government take over the short-line roads. I say this because of my belief, long entertained, that the railroads of the United States, the trunk lines, and all the other roads should be combined into one great transportation system. And in keeping with this belief, and as a consequence of it, I have for many years maintained that the antipooling law ought to be repealed. On this important subject I do not know that I can more clearly express my views than I did on November 19, 1902, in an interview of some length, published in the Milwaukee Free Press, and to a brief excerpt from which I beg to invite the attention of the committee:

"We have by law prohibited railroads from consolidating. We have also prohibited them from pooling. In other words, we have practically endeavored to compel them to be competitors. But yet, just as soon as they begin to practice the ordinary methods of competition and to sell transportation at cut prices they give the favored ones an enormous power which in turn enables them to monopolize the market and crush competitors.

"Now, as to the remedy, I am inclined to the opinion that, under present conditions, a pooling law, carefully, strongly guarded with ample authority of Government supervision, is the most immediately feasible, practicable remedy. Honestly enforced, as it could be, it would afford reasonable rates, stability in rates, something greatly to be desired, and best of all, equality in rates. Moreover, it would do entire justice to the railroads and also to the people. This would give the smaller shipper an equal chance with the trust to transport his products and in this respect tend to preserve the great principle of equality before the law.

"Under the old pooling system, the railroads fixed the rates in secret and the public knew nothing about them and had no supervision over them. Under a proper pooling law the rate would be fixed by strict Government authority and under the supervision of the Interstate Commerce Commission, with privileges of appeal to the United States Supreme Court. The agreement would be public and its provisions known to all the people. If it were unjust in any particular, public opinion would soon find and enforce a remedy. This publicity in and of itself would prove one of the best correctives.

"I know that there are some objections which can be urged to a pooling law, but so there can be to almost any law. But from my study of the problem I see no alternative for this remedy other than Government ownership."

During the years since that interview I have not changed the views then expressed. On the contrary, experience has served to strengthen them.

I am in favor of further amending the present bill by doing away with the provision to fix a time limit. It is absolutely impossible now to tell what conditions will be when this terrific war shall end, how much money the Government of the United States will have to put into the roads, or what complications will then exist. An arbitrary fixing now of a time limit might be a source of great embarrassment to the Government and to the roads. No harm can come by striking it out. Let Congress have the right when the war ends to consider the whole subject thoroughly and to say what ought to be done, in view of the then existing situation—it may be emergency. [Applause.]

Mr. ESCH. I yield the balance of my time——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the time has been checked up since the statement was made before the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] began to speak, and the Chair finds that the gentleman from Wisconsin has only two minutes left.

Mr. ESCH. I yield that time to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I wish to occupy these two minutes merely in discussing the amendment I have offered and which I understand my colleague, who offered the original amendment, will accept. As the amendment now reads, it seems very clear to me that taking over the short-line competing roads would not be in the exercise of a war power at all. All of the roads that have been taken over under the act of August, 1916, are under the war power and are taken over for war purposes, and clearly, under the method of compensation which we provided, we have no right to take over any road simply upon the ground that it is competing with a road that has been taken over. In other words, to justify the taking over of any road under these circumstances it must be an exercise of the war power. Now, we have a right to say, as the fact is, that every railroad in this country that is a feeder of a system of railroads is a competitor and that it is necessary to carry on the war, and my amendment merely provides for a declaration in the bill itself that these roads that will be taken over under the amendment are necessary for the prosecution of the war, and therefore bring them within the war power of Congress in exactly the same way that the roads are brought in that have been heretofore taken over. I hope there will be no objection to perfecting the amendment so as to make that certain.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman and gentleman of the committee, it was evident from the beginning that the standard return as provided in the bill, or as might be provided in any other way, could not apply equitably and justly to all railroad companies that it might be necessary to take over for the better prosecution of the war and for such other purposes connected with the emergency as might be needful or desirable. Now, in order that injustice might be done to none of the short lines, weak lines, or lines in receivership—it made no difference about the length of the lines as far as the principle was concerned; we got to calling them "short lines"—the committee amended the bill from its original form and provided the language found on page 5, the last part of section 1:

> If the President shall find that the condition of any carrier was during all or a substantial portion of the period of three years ended June 30, 1917, because of nonoperation, receivership, or any undeveloped or abnormal conditions, so exceptional as to make the basis of earnings hereinabove provided for plainly inequitable as a fair measure of just compensation, then the President may make with the carrier such agreement for such amount as just compensation as under the circumstances of the particular case he shall find just.

Now, that was to cover all railroads taken over by the President where it would be inequitable and unjust to apply the standard return, and practically provides that each road so taken over shall be given such just compensation as the particular circumstances and facts relating to the particular road may require. Many short lines, so called, in the course of construction have not paid dividends. They have built a few miles and bonded them and built a few more and bonded those, and these roads were not sufficiently complete for the traffic to be profitable, yet if that particular road was taken over and used by the Government for Government purposes, of course, it was equitable, right, and just that such payment should be paid for such use as the Government made of it while the road itself was earning nothing in the way of net returns or profits before being taken over. Now, that seems to meet the case of all such railroads so taken over. I have heard no complaint of it.

But there are other railroads, short lines they are usually called, though, in fact, whether short or long lines, that will not be taken over by the President. They seriously complain that if we take over the trunk lines or large systems on which through business is done, and leave them without the benefits which they enjoyed before of soliciting freight and of soliciting shippers to route their freight so as to go over their particular lines, they ought to be relieved from any incidental injury that would come by routing freight over trunk lines that they otherwise would get if they were left with the power to do just what they had been doing, namely, soliciting freight, and have all the benefits they had before. We left it where if the President might find it necessary as a war measure to divert freight that they otherwise would get, that then he might do it; but that he should divert such other unrouted freight from this particular line to this short line, which it would not otherwise have received, sufficient to indemnify it from the injuries that might otherwise come from diverting such traffic from it.

A proposition of that kind was brought to me by the gentlemen from North Carolina, Messrs. WEBB and KITCHIN, and with some of the presidents of the short-line railroads that did not anticipate their being taken over accompanying them.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Was not he also the president of the Short-Line Railroad Association?

Mr. SIMS. One of them was. But Mr. Byrd Robinson was not with them at the time they came to me. They insisted with the committee and with the Director General—if not in person, through others—that this proposition be accepted, to hold them harmless against other roads being taken over that might interfere with the business they could do if the other roads had not been taken over. And it was put in the bill just as it was written and delivered, without the crossing of a "t" or the dotting of an "i."

Now, I do not know what was in the minds of the short-line men. Some of them, as being represented here now, are coming in and saying that they thought that was all they could get, and they accepted it. Now there is a chance, they think, to get more, and therefore they do not want to be estopped or bound by their acceptance of this provision.

Now, I am just like other gentlemen who have spoken here. I have short lines, so called, in my district, and they are all over Tennessee, and Mr. Byrd Robinson is interested in one of the roads of that kind in Tennessee. There are a number of them, and I have every reason, so far as wanting to court the influence and support of the gentlemen who are interested in these short lines is concerned, to be in favor of them. And I am, just as far as I can be without it being at the expense of the taxpayer and the public.

Mr. LEVER. Will the gentleman from Tennessee let me ask him a question?

Mr. SIMS. Yes, sir.

Mr. LEVER. What is the objection to the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH], as amended by his colleague, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], where the President must make a finding of fact if it is necessary for these roads to be taken over in prosecution of the war?

Mr. SIMS. It has not been so amended. It has only been proposed to amend it.

Mr. LEVER. What is the objection to the proposition?

Mr. SIMS. I am going to try to give you the objection if I can.

Now, what is the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH]? It is an amendment, as I understand and as he admitted, that was adopted in the Senate yesterday, and its language is:

That every railroad not owned, controlled, or operated by another carrier company, and which has heretofore competed for traffic with a railroad or railroads of which the President has taken the possession, use, and control, shall be held and considered as within "Federal control," as herein defined, and shall be entitled to the benefit of all the provisions of this act.

How many of these short-line railroads that at one end go nowhere, so far as any other railroad is concerned, and unite with a trunk line at the other end? Have they been competing with the trunk line? How could they be competing with it? They can solicit freight from shippers to be sent over their road. Now, where one of these so-called short lines might reach from one trunk line railroad to another trunk line railroad, and the freight might be routed over the trunk line one way and then diverted over on the short line, say, a 50-mile road, and on one of the lines it connects with it might get 40 miles of the haul and on the other 10 miles, it would be to the interest of the short-line men to get shipments from the trunk lines on which it would get the greatest division of the through rate. That is the only competition that I can imagine between any of these so-called short lines with a trunk line railroad that would be taken over.

Now, this amendment only applies to roads not taken over but that do compete with some road that is taken over. Look to what you are creating here. How many such roads are there in the United States?

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. I will.

Mr. HARDY. Does not this bill take care of those short-line roads that are leased to trunk line roads, providing that the lease-contract arrangement shall be continued?

Mr. SIMS. It does not abrogate any lease contracts.

Mr. HARDY. In that way, then, the bill takes care of these leased short lines, and only leaves the unleased lines?

Mr. SIMS. The bill takes care of affirmatively only the short lines taken over, and endeavors to avoid harm coming to those not taken over. That is, the bill as it stands is exactly what the gentlemen who are interested in these roads represented to us they wanted.

Let us look this matter squarely in the face. What is the object and purpose of this amendment? It is to force the President to take over a road that he has no use for as a war measure or any other purpose incidental or connected with the emergency that may be needful and desirable. Now, you gentlemen who have raised the red flag against Government control and Government ownership are now voting for it in principle, because in taking over these roads, according to your own showing, you are not taking them over as a war measure or for any other purpose incident to or growing out of it.

You are taking them over in order that the Government may pay out of the pockets of the taxpayers any incidental injury that they may receive during this war. Now, on the theory of that, if you take over one factory for the purpose of manufacturing war material, clothes for uniforms, or anything of that sort, and some other factory somewhere else is manufacturing those things, and it comes and says, "Here, Mr. Government, you have taken over that factory and you are damaging my business by doing so, and now you must take mine over, too."

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Is it not a fact that if we support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin it is looking solely to the interest of the stockholders in the matter rather than to the prosecution of the war?

Mr. SIMS. Yes; and the bondholders. Now, let us see how far that will go.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. The stock of many of the railroads of this country, the large trunk lines, is quoted at 3 or 4 per cent. They will be taken over.

Mr. SIMS. Yes; and why? To help them?

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Why not, then, take over the others?

Mr. SIMS. Are they taken over to help the country or to help the roads? Which side are you on—to help the country or the roads?

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. The law provides for taking some of them over and discriminates against others by not taking them over.

Mr. SIMS. The law provides for taking them over, long or short, for any purpose the Government wants.

Now, the following Senate amendment follows immediately in the same bill:

Provided further, That the President may relinquish all railroads under Federal control at any time he shall deem such action needful or desirable. No right to compensation shall accrue to any owner from and after the date of relinquishment for property relinquished under authority of this section.

You give the President the power to do that, which is for the protection of the country. You provide that if he should take over a railroad, thinking it was needed under the law and under the facts by the Government, and he discovers by July 1 that it is not needed, he can reliquish it or any part of it, or by agreement relinquish any other railroad.

Now, what are you doing? You are voting here by law to place every railroad in the United States, whether it is needed for war purposes or incidental to or growing out of it, or for ordinary commerce, in the hands of the President simply in order that he may have an opportunity between now and June 30 to relinquish every one of them? Now, are you going to put this amendment in and have the Senate provision that immediately follows it authorize the President to immediately relinquish every road thus taken over?

If I were advocating Government ownership, I would howl for this amendment forcing the Government to take over a carrier without any excuse under heaven for taking it over except that the railroad companies may be injured if you do not do it. Unification is desirable, and yet you are getting unification at the expense of the taxpayer if we are to take over every railroad in the United States, whether it is needed or not for war or related purposes.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Suppose the bill, as drawn by the committee, should take over a trunk line? Would that force it to take over all the subsidiary lines in connection with that trunk line?

Mr. SIMS. It could take over all the lines belonging to that road constituting a system of transportation.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The Government has not the right to exclude the short lines belonging to that road?

Mr. SIMS. It may take over a system, a railroad, or any part of it.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. You understand it can take over a part of a system to the exclusion of the other part?

Mr. SIMS. Yes. That is the law. Here is the law.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. I would like to understand the gentleman's position. Do I understand the gentleman to advocate that, through the exercise of the war power conferred by this bill in the rerouting of freight or otherwise, the sole source of revenue on a short-line road should be taken away from it, and it is not entitled to compensation by the Government?

Mr. SIMS. It will not be taken over unless it is necessary as a war measure, and if traffic is diverted from a road not taken over the President is authorized to reroute other freight over that road in order to compensate it and make it whole, as to the loss of traffic to other roads taken over.

Mr. REAVIS. If in the exercise of the power granted by this bill the source of revenue were taken away from the short line, or otherwise, should not the Government compensate that road for the injury?

Mr. SIMS. Yes; in the way I have stated the President may compensate it. But I do not think it is right to take a railroad over just for the luxury of having done so, when nothing grows out of it in the way of benefits to the Government either as a war measure or otherwise.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired. Under the order of the House all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto has expired. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] offers an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, can we have the original amendment reported first, and then the amendment offered to the original amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the original amendment will again be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ESCH: Amend section 1 by adding thereto, page 5, line 19, the following as a new paragraph:

"That every railroad not owned or controlled or operated by another carrier company and which has heretofore competed for traffic with a railroad or railroads of which the President has taken the possession, use, and control, shall be held and considered as within Federal control, as herein defined, and shall be entitled to the benefit of all the provisions of this act."

Amendment offered by Mr. LENROOT to the Esch amendment: After the word "defined," in the Esch amendment, insert the following: "and necessary for the prosecution of the war," so that the amendment as amended will read as follows:

"That every railroad not owned or controlled or operated by another carrier company and which has heretofore competed for traffic with a railroad or railroads of which the President has taken the possession, use, and control, shall be held and considered as within Federal control, as herein defined and necessary for the prosecution of the war, and shall be entitled to all the benefits of the provisions of this act."

Mr. ESCH. I ask unanimous consent to offer a verbal amendment, to change the word "nor," in the first line of the amendment, to "or."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk has already modified that. The question is upon the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Is a further amendment to the amendment in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The question will first be taken on the amendment to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

The question being taken, on a division there were—ayes 96, noes 30.

Accordingly the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer another amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GREEN of Iowa to the amendment offered by Mr. ESCH: After the words "possession, use, and control" insert the following: "or which connects with such railroads and is engaged as a common carrier in general transportation."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. ESCH and Mr. DOREMUS) there were—ayes 73, noes 37.

Accordingly the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment as amended.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment as amended be read again. I did not quite catch it.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Oh, no!

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the amendment as amended be again reported. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois objects. The question is on the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman a member of the committee?

Mr. DOWELL. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will first recognize the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE], a member of the committee, to offer an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MONTAGUE: Page 5, line 13, after the word "receivership" insert the following: "or where recent expenditures for additions or improvements or equipment were not fully reflected in the net operating railway income of said three years, or a substantial portion thereof."

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I will say this is the provision contained in the Senate bill and reported by the Senate Interstate Commerce Committee to the Senate bill. It simply undertakes to make more certain the language used in the paragraph and to make it clear that the discretionary power in dealing with roads that have not had time, by reason of extraordinary circumstances or the opportunity, to reflect their income in the operating revenue as such shall be included. I imagine that there will be no objection to it. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce have not formally passed upon it, but I have shown it to several members of the committee, among them the chairman and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH], and others.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I will.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask the gentleman whether it is not the claim of every railroad company that their net earnings do not and have not during the past three years fully reflected the earnings that they were entitled to by reason of betterments and improvements?

Mr. MONTAGUE. That may or may not be. The gentleman knows as much about that as I do. I am simply trying to make the paragraph mean what it is intended to mean; that is all.

Mr. LENROOT. If it is true that every railroad makes that claim, does it not leave the discretion of the President unlimited, so far as any railroad is concerned, and leave him without any limitation as to the amount which he may agree upon?

Mr. MONTAGUE. If it does, I will say to the gentleman that it is already in the section.

Mr. LENROOT. No; certainly not.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the gentleman's amendment. If I correctly understood the purport of the last amendment just adopted by the committee, this amendment of the gentleman from Virginia is more necessary than ever. Apparently by the last amendment we have decided to take over all of the lines, whether the President considers them necessary or not, that happen to be competing with any of the lines that are taken over. Now, when the order was issued to take over these transportation companies, it is my understanding that only such as were absolutely essential as a war activity were going to be taken over, and very wisely, I think, a great many railroads were excluded from the operation of the order taking over the railroads. But apparently we have decided that these railroads are to be taken over if they compete with the roads in the hands of the Director General.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. When were any of the roads excluded? They were certainly all included in the order, and my recollection is that Secretary McAdoo in his statement before the committee said that all of the roads were notified and all were included in the order, and that none had been excluded up to this time.

Mr. BORLAND. I am not able to quote any of the orders, but my understanding is that from time to time the Secretary has released certain roads that were included in the original blanket order. I think I am correct about that, and that he purposes to release some other roads that prove not to be necessary in the operation of the systems for military purposes. Now, it does seem to me that he would naturally release a great many of these roads that were not completed or not being operated during the last three years.

That would be the class of roads that he would naturally release, because it would be hardly necessary to burden the Government with the management of those roads and with the use of property whose owners themselves are not able to make use of it. But here we adopted an amendment a few minutes ago that will take over these roads notwithstanding the wishes of the Director General or the President. I understand the claim is made that the whole matter will go to conference. On the contrary, I understand that the whole matter will not go to conference. The Senate having adopted one amendment, and we having adopted that amendment with certain amendments, the only thing in conference will be the amendments that we have added to the Senate amendment. So practically we have decided in both Houses in favor of the railroads.

Mr. ESCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Certainly.

Mr. ESCH. It is likely when we consider the House bill that we will move to substitute it for the Senate bill, and where we substitute it for the entire Senate measure the conferees are not bound.

Mr. BORLAND. That would put the matter in better shape.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield on that point?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. It may not be proper to talk about another body, but the Senate has held that in any substitute bill where language is identical in both bills, the conferees are not free to change the language.

Mr. BORLAND. That is my understanding. The whole matter is one of policy, and that policy being whether we are going to take over a lot of railroads for the benefit of the railroads, or take them over exclusively as a war policy, as a necessary preparation for war. If we are following the latter policy, taking only the roads that are necessary to strike the enemy, we are taking over a different class of roads from what is contemplated by the last amendment. We ought to take over roads absolutely essential and leave out all roads that have not been successfully operated, and which do not seem to be an economical necessity according to the record of the last three years. So it seems that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] is more necessary than before. It will give the President authority to make contracts with all roads whose expenses during the last three years have been abnormal.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does not the gentleman think that if we take over the roads generally as a war measure that where it operates disastrously on some roads, going business concerns, short lines, that they are entitled to some consideration because of that fact, if the taking over will bring them disaster?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; I have seen that standpoint. These small lines claim that now they are competing with the larger lines, soliciting business, making traffic arrangements, and getting a share, possibly, of the Government business; but after the larger lines are taken over by the Government the Government business will all go to the roads under Government management and that the smaller roads will be somewhat crippled in the opportunity of obtaining traffic.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Very seriously crippled and perhaps destroyed.

Mr. BORLAND. Under section 9 we have attempted to take care of it as far as we can by legislation. We have said that the Director General must not disturb the traffic arrangements of the roads not taken over, except so far as the transportation of war materials is concerned, and then in case such change does reduce the tonnage to divert other tonnage over the line as far as possible to make up the loss. As far as I know, the short lines are agreed to that proposition.

Mr. SIMS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES].

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman and gentleman of the Congress, on last evening the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] received 17 minutes of the time of this Congress to make a Bolsheviki speech. Some days before he was designated by the Speaker of this House to occupy the chair under the flag and near the likeness or painting of the Father of our Country, a very incongruous thing, I thought, in view of the fact that he thinks Washington one of the worst enemies that democracy ever had. I wondered that this man, who believed our experiment has been a failure, should ever have been allowed to occupy the Speaker's chair [applause] under the flag of our country.

Now, I have only 10 minutes, but I am going to get an hour of time in a few days, and I am going to make a Democratic speech. It is not going to sound anything like the London brand of democracy that he has talked about.

This is what he said in his speech:

The value of a political democracy lies in the opportunity of the people to evolute into an industrial democracy.

Ours has been a political democracy under Washington and Jefferson and Madison and Hamilton, a democracy that guarantees property rights and the rights of life and liberty and the pursuit of happiness. He says that it is a right to evolute into a Bolsheviki industrial democracy, the like of which is now seen in Russia, where we have a demonstration of the efficacy of the Bolsheviki democracy. Nowhere, my friends, under the canopy of heaven has mankind been vouchsafed so great a Government as this which our fathers instituted and perpetuated up to this time. [Applause.] Wherever in all the annals of history has religion been so free to worship God under the dictates of his own conscience as America? Wherever have the portals of hope and opportunity been so wide open as in this our free land of liberty in America? And yet this man comes and says he wants it to evolute, "evolute" into an industrial democracy, the like that Lenine and Trotsky are practicing in Russia to-day.

What is that democracy? It is to go into the stable of your neighbor and take his horse, to go into the fields and take his plow, to go into the highway and, as you go, take his property, and he calls that industrial democracy. And when the great German Empire approaches the Bolsheviki socialism of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON], what does that socialism say in response to the edict of the Kaiser? "Well, now, do not come any further, because we will make a speech on you if you do." [Laughter.] You stop raping the women and burning the houses and killing the stock, because if you do not we will pass a resolution on you." [Laughter.] And in the meantime the Bolsheviki socialism of evolution stops and cringes beneath the iron hand of German imperialism. In the name of God, democracy, Washington, Jefferson, and Hamilton, we shall have none of that in our country. [Applause.]

Do you know, I have heard so much of that, and it is so weak and impotent, that I have become thoroughly disgusted with it. Let the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] rise before this majestic Congress, the greatest representative body on earth, and let him tell—or anyone who ever lived on this earth—of any country that has had as much in its life of hope and liberty and justice as the American Republic has had for the last hundred years. And yet he says we can make it better. Well, you have got a Swiss watch, we will say, in your pocket. None was ever made better. No man can rise and say that watches were ever made better; but yet some watchmaker comes along and he says, "Let me have it; I can take the works out of it and make it better"; and will you turn it over to him? No, no. My friends, this question needs to be aired before the American people. This is the greatest Republic that the genius and the patriotism of man ever instituted, and under our great Constitution there has been afforded to the people more hope, more courage, more pride than was ever vouchsafed in any Government before; and are you going to let a lot of ignorant-headed Socialists try an experiment on you? You have had your rail-splitting Lincoln, you have had your Grover Cleveland sweeping the office, you have the greatest railroad system in the world and the greatest system of Government in the world, and yet you have let a Socialist from New York stand up there under the flag of our country, and in the very presence of the portrait of the Father of our Country, and say that this country has been the greatest failure in the world! In the name of God, it has been the greatest Republic in the world, and men have been afforded the privilege of pursuing their inspirations and their religion more freely than anywhere else in the world.

A man in the ditches digging can become its president; a man who split rails on the farm in Illinois could become the great leader of freedom in the world. [Applause.] He has been, and yet the gentleman from New York comes and says: "We will make it a Russian Bolsheviki, an evolution of democracy." Without honesty in the state there can be no liberty; without property rights and the respect of property rights there can be no liberty. Your peasant to-day who takes his master's farm is not only a patrician in point of land ownership, but a thief from the soil as well. If you could break down this great democracy to-day, if you could steal the land from the landed man, take his horse and his mule and his cow and his cultivators and his tools from him, still the same problem of life exists. You have got to cultivate the soil, you have got to have morality in the people. It has got to be a citizenship of democracy to produce the food of life and the raiment of life. Suppose you steal the railroads; suppose you take them, and if you take the farms and the banks and the factories from those who toil and who by thrift and self-denial have accumulated the property of the country, you will have a national dishonesty in feeling; and, in addition to that, the old earth will never give her fruit except to those who toil. No more corn shall ever grow; no more wheat shall ever bud and bloom and make the bread of the world, except that labor go into the fields and strive and struggle for it; and I commend to socialism these words—honesty, liberty, thrift, and toil. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be permitted to proceed for 10 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas be permitted to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, without immodesty I may say I have read something of the history of the world. I know something of the struggle of roving bands before the Greeks formed themselves into little bits of republics. I have followed down through the great Roman Empire, through Charlemagne's aggregation of power. I have studied the attempt of mankind to have free government, and this effort upon this hemisphere has been the most nearly complete and successful that the children of men have ever made. [Applause.] The gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON], my Socialist friend, can not find in all the history of the world a government he would prefer to this. Where would you go to seek it? Would you go to Sparta, with its iron money and its iron rule, or to Athens, with its failures of a pure democracy? Would you go to Rome or to the Dutch Republics or to the Amphictyonic League? No! Even the gentleman from New York is advised sufficiently to tell you, if you ask him the question, that this is the greatest republic, the most complete democracy the world has ever seen; and so it has been; and he could not prefer another over it. Then, I ask you a question. If our fathers had builded a bulwark of liberty here, if here they have raised a government of liberty that surpasses all that our forebears were ever able to do in the history of the world before, when did it come to pass that you and I should sit under the drippings of the fountain of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON], who follows Lenine and Trotzky, who backed off before the German machine to-day? You have got to meet power with power. To-day we are taking over the railroads, or the President has already taken them over and we are ratifying what he did—not that we believe in government ownership of railroads, but we believe, as the Roman people believed, that in a national emergency you must have concentration of power.

They said in the midst of war the laws are silent. They established a dictatorship. You must meet German imperialism to-day with concentration of power, and we are going to give the President, whoever he is, whether it were Roosevelt I would say the same, whether it were Champ Clark I would say the same, whoever would be in the White House to-day I would say the same thing—give him the power that he may focus in his own will all the strength and resources of the American Republic to do our bidding. [Applause.] And do not you ever think that we will tolerate socialism and the arguments of socialism in this national emergency. We mean to get back all the power of the people when this war is over. [Applause.] We mean to get back all the principles our fathers won and exercised when this war is over, and we are not going to have any of your socialism, your Lenines and Trotzkys, men who want to put women in the trenches to dig, your miserable socialism that interposes debate in your army and speeches and skulking cowardice to the enemies of one's country as they come with fire and sword, and you back off and say, "Don't you do it; if you do we will make trouble with you." [Applause.] Not that. We mean to interpose the breasts of our valiant youths; we mean to interpose the wealth of America, the solidarity of America, the Republic of America, against the concentrated aggression of German imperialism. I have not any sympathy with your Lenines and Trotzkys. I have no sympathy with Russian socialism that is ground in the dust. They are getting what is coming to them. They imagine it is Russian socialism if you steal land or steal a plow or steal the fodder or steal a mule or steal horses. You think that means democracy? Democracy means law and order; democracy means property rights guaranteed to those who sow the seed that they shall reap the harvest; it guarantees to those who build that they shall live in the houses they have built. Liberty without property rights is nothing, worthless, and you find it so now.

One time I saw in Haiti among the negroes who overthrew their masters a lot of old, rotten, standpipes of the sugar factories. They wanted land, but when they got it they would not work it, and I know that if you gave my friend from New York [Mr. LONDON] 160 acres of land and four mules he would not work it. [Laughter and applause.] There is not going to be any socialism here; no socialism. We are honest. My dollar is my dollar, and when a man works a day and gets $2 and saves a dollar that he puts aside that is his money; that belongs to him to shelter him in his old age; it is his home, his bulwalk, his place of refuge. We are not going to have socialism here, my friends. And listen. Let me tell you something. Your dream of socialism is a nightmare in Russia to-day. Go get your Lenines and Trotzkys behind their defeated lines and falling empire. Do not ask a Republic, the democracy of Hamilton and Jefferson, of Lee and Grant and Lincoln, to subscribe to your theory of demoralized socialism because the laborer is worthy of his hire and the man who struggles to win property, sweats for it and denies himself to be something, he is not entitled to be shattered by the dream of socialism. And it will not occur in this country. Gentlemen, this speech is provoked by seeing the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] sitting under the flag that he says was a failure [applause], near the picture of the Father of his Country who gave us the Republic. The gentleman says he could have done much better if he had been President at the time. I wonder, my friends, how many of you in this audience to-day think a greater constellation of States could be formed than that our forefathers erected?

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Only one.

Mr. DIES. Only one! Now, listen, I will tell you this; I want to compliment you, but I can not do it. You know we are dreaming away a great heritage. A great Republic has been builded for us; the great heritage of democracy, the like of which the world never saw in all the annals of history, has been handed down to us. Here is liberty; here is the right to worship; here is security of property and life; here is a great Republic, the like of which the world never saw, and men sit down and doze while men like the gentleman from New York fiddle while republics disintegrate. [Applause.] I bid you, I bid you, my friends, give the President all the power he seeks. In the name of God, when the war is over, take it away from him; take it back to yourselves and your country. [Applause.] And let this be a free Republic, secure in property rights and secure in individual rights, where in the name of God the blighting shadow of Bolsheviki socialism may come to haunt our dreams no more. [Applause.]

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, may I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I shall endeavor to answer soberly and in a spirit of kindness the remarks of the eloquent gentleman from Texas.

I addressed my remarks yesterday to the distinct proposition of the public and national ownership of railroads. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] is probably not familiar with the American literature that has grown up on this subject, and I would recommend to him that, in addition to the information he has received about the fathers of this Republic, whom I revere as much as he, that he should enlighten himself on the literature of political economists who advocate national ownership of public utilities. I would recommend, among other books, the book "The Railways, Trusts, and the People," by Prof. Frank Parsons, the author of a number of books, and one of the best-known scholars in the science of political economy.

When the gentleman talks about socialism, I can not take him seriously at all; he does not know what he is talking about. When he talks about the greatness of this country, I agree with him. No man in the world loves this country with a deeper love than I do, but to me democracy is not a static condition. To me democracy is force in action. Democracy must necessarily be dynamic. Lincoln, Washington, Jefferson were great because they met the problems of their day and hour. They did not point to the great men who preceded them centuries before. The gentleman looks to the grave all the time from his little village in Texas. He studies the past and points backward all the time. I have my face toward the sun. [Applause.]

This Republic is a glorious country. It has made inestimable contributions to the progress of the world. It has established the principle of religious freedom. It has welcomed the oppressed of the entire world. It has opened opportunities for all. It has done away with the religious prejudices of the hypocrite, of the narrow-minded, of the fool, and of the vulgar. It has done away with them. Here and there in some obscurantist mind religious prejudice may still linger for a while, but it is bound to be dispelled in the sunshine of genuine Americanism.

Socialism is a legitimate doctrine, a doctrine which seeks to preserve property to the man who produces it. When millions of men toil away their lives and find the result of their labor accumulated in Wall Street, they seek a way of giving to the people the product of their toil. Is it wrong to suggest industrial democracy as the way? The gentleman does not believe in the socialism of democracy; he believes in what a Democratic President, Cleveland, called the "communism of pelf."

The statesman from Texas treats with contempt those poor unfortunate men in Russia who have gone through centuries of oppression and through pain and martyrdom, who have been led by an unspeakable tyrant into a war not of their making. These poor men are trying to build a republic, build a free nation for 180,000,000 men; and you treat them with contempt, you flout them, you ridicule them. Is that American? I deny it. Every American heart is filled with sympathy for that long-suffering people. [Applause.]

Have not all statesmen, all Republican and Democratic Presidents, the right to make mistakes? Then, give the same right to the representatives of the poor people. In the year 1066 a band of pirates seized England and divided the land among their pals; and their division of 1066, sanctified in 1085, is the basis of England's economic, juridical, and political institutions up to date, and the great-great-grandchildren of those pirates are the aristocracy of that land to-day.

If it was right in 1066 to lay the foundation for land ownership and for the law and for the political and economic institutions for one country, why is it wrong for the 180,000,000 men who till the soil and who work and who labor—why is it wrong for that 180,000,000 people to try to establish an economic system which shall secure to every one of those 180,000,000 men access to the soil and the right to live the life of free men?

Just recall the long struggle of this little Republic to establish a Government. Do you realize what these men had to live through. Is it fair to talk of Russia's experiment to-day as a socialistic experiment? Can you make an experiment in socialism under the conditions which surround her? Can you improve a ship when it is struggling not to be wrecked? That is Russia's condition to-day. Socialism is not being experimented upon there. The land is in agony; everything there is abnormal. War and revolution combined flow terrible. We all hope that Russia will not rest until every feudal landowner is driven not only from the soil of Russia but from the soil of Europe forever. We all hope that, and that is one of the aspirations of the socialist movement. No matter what happens, we must treat Russia with love and tenderness.

Please do not talk of the socialist movement as if you knew something about it. The gentleman from Texas is a very brilliant man and I am very sorry to see his brilliancy going to waste in the choking atmosphere of the cloakroom. He has not been much on the floor. When he talks to me about socialists refusing to work, he is wrong. It is true that I would not work with mules. My work is against mules. I have tried to do my duty as I saw it, inviting the attack of the uninformed, of the prejudiced, and of the vulgar, and I must say there has been but very little of it on the floor of the House. Although only five hours from New York, I have not been going home very often. I am always here, studying men, studying legislation, watching and observing, striving to know more, so as to be more useful.

I am doing my duty as well as any other Member of Congress, and I am working as hard as any Member of Congress ever did. [Applause.] I refuse to accept either the wisdom or the methods of the gentleman from Texas.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. LONDON. Just half a minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. LONDON. I hope our discussion has not degenerated into a personal squabble. I really do not want to be mean to the gentleman from Texas. I do not think he intended to be mean with me. He simply disagreed with my views. I beg to assure him that, so far as the high ideals of American democracy are concerned, I do not yield to any man or woman in love and admiration for the fundamental spiritual ideals of America—the love of liberty for every human being. We differ as to how best to secure that liberty. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, there is nothing pending before the committee. I ask that the Clerk read.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment and ask to have it read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DOWELL: Add to section 1 the following: "Provided, That in no case the income—that is, the sum remaining after deducting for operation, maintenance, taxes, fixed charges, interest on funded and unfunded debt, and all other items of expense according to the system of accounting established by the Interstate Commerce Commission, of any such carrier—shall exceed 7 per cent on the par value of its stock outstanding on the 31st day of December, 1917."

Mr. DOWELL. The taking over of the railroads by the Government necessarily involves the payment of a reasonable compensation for their use. Every fair-minded person, of course, believes that these companies should receive a fair and just compensation. Under the plan proposed in the bill the President is authorized to pay a sum equal to the average net income the road received for the three years prior to June 30, 1917. It is apparent to everyone that these railroads have not all been earning the same profits. While many of the roads have been exceedingly profitable, others have received but small incomes. If the railroad has not received a reasonably fair income during the three-year period referred to, then the President is authorized to make such agreement for compensation as, under the circumstances, he shall find just. In other words, to the company receiving the large income during the three-year period the President is authorized to continue the payment of this large income. To the company not receiving what is deemed by him reasonable he is authorized to increase the income to a reasonable and just compensation.

I am advised that many of these roads during the period referred to have been receiving very large incomes, while others, of course, do not receive so much.

I want to call your attention to the further fact that under the provisions of the bill the Government must keep these roads in good repair. The Government is responsible for all of the upkeep of the roads. The stockholders assume no responsibility whatever. The Government assumes all of the risk and it agrees that these roads will be kept in as good condition as they were in when taken over by the Government. I assume that the Government will keep both the letter and spirit of this agreement. Above these expenses, I believe everyone desires to pay to these roads what is reasonable and right; but under the circumstances, it seems to me, we should pay no more. This amendment leaves abundance of latitude.

The Government is calling upon our citizens to make sacrifices they have never known before. It has called upon them in the past and they have patriotically responded to every call. It must call upon them again and again, until this war is ended in a great victory. I know and you know that the people of America will respond to this call until victory is won. But it does seem to me that all should sacrifice in the same way. We should not take from one and give it to the other. Every citizen owes exactly the same obligation to his country in this crisis.

I submit that the average net income of many of the large railroad companies for the three years prior to June 30, 1917, according to the reports from the Interstate Commerce Commission, is much more than the Government should pay for the use of these roads, and this amendment is for the purpose of limiting the compensation of all roads receiving larger incomes than are reasonable and just. [Applause.]

Mr. VENABLE. Mr. Chairman, I think this amendment should be voted down, for the following reasons: Of course, Congress can not exercise the power of taking private property for a public use without just compensation, which is a sound principle upon which we are all agreed; neither is the saying of what is just compensation a part of the function of the legislature. It is necessarily and essentially the exercise of a judicial function, or a function of the judiciary, to determine what is reasonable, and it has been so decided in numerous decisions. Otherwise you would have the agency which was taking away the property of the citizen by legislation deciding what that citizen would receive, instead of invoking the impartial tribunalship of the courts.

Now, unless your bill, which takes private property for public use, provides some method by which the citizen can go into the courts and get a determination of what is just compensation, it is unconstitutional, as I understand it. So this Congress can not say that 7 per cent is a reasonable amount, because that does not lie within our function, if we are undertaking to determine what the citizen shall receive at all events. If, however, it is sought to put this in simply as a limitation upon the discretion which the President shall exercise in his negotiations with the owners of these roads in the effort to reach an agreement, we are possibly interfering very seriously with the accomplishment of one of the main purposes of the bill, which is to see if an agreement can not be reached, and, by so doing, avoid the flood of litigation which will come if you do not provide some reasonable way by which the claims of the owners of the roads can be settled out of court.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VENABLE. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The gentleman understands that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL] limits the compensation or limits the power of the President in making this agreement. I think it was the last.

Mr. VENABLE. I understood it was the last.

Mr. RAMSEYER. It is a proviso.

Mr. VENABLE. Yes; it was the last, because it would be a nullity if you gave it the first construction. It would be clearly unconstitutional.

Mr. RAMSEYER. It is the last.

Mr. VENABLE. I am assuming that it could be one or both, according as I understood the language. Now, then, this Congress——

Mr. LITTLE. Do I understand the gentleman to suggest it is unconstitutional to limit the rate of interest?

Mr. VENABLE. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. You have another guess coming.

Mr. VENABLE. That is a difference of opinion. Otherwise we would not have debates. I say that if this Congress would undertake to take the property of the citizen and at the same time fix what the citizen should receive from the property, your act would be unconstitutional, because it has been held time and time again that the determination of what is just compensation is not a legislative but a judicial function, and by fixing compensation by legislative enactment, without giving opportunity for judicial determination, you deny due process of law.

Mr. LITTLE. Does not the law limit the rate of interest that a man may receive on the money that he loans?

Mr. VENABLE. As I understood the amendment, it was to fix the compensation which should be paid to these railroads for the use of their property.

Mr. LITTLE. What is the difference between fixing the maximum compensation that railroads shall receive and fixing the maximum interest which a loan broker shall receive?

Mr. VENABLE. Oh, the greatest difference in the world. In one case you are taking a man's property against his will. The legislation of your State fixing the rate of interest on money loaned simply provides what shall be lawful for the parties to agree upon between themselves, fixing the outside limit. There is no deprivation of property under your interest-fixing statutes in the various States.

Mr. LITTLE. There is no deprivation here. Is not this a guarantee of the preservation of property?

Mr. VENABLE. We are not asking these railroads whether they want to be taken over or not. We are taking them over.

Mr. LITTLE. We have got them.

Mr. VENABLE. We have already got them. We would have taken them over whether they agreed to it or not, and we can not take them over under the Constitution without providing just compensation.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, I have a substitute which I desire to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment to the amendment?

Mr. DILLON. A substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. A substitute for the amendment?

Mr. DILLON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota will send his amendment to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DILLON as a substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. DOWELL: Add to section 1 the following:

"Provided, That the Government guaranty to the carrier provided herein shall not in any case exceed 7 per cent of its capital stock outstanding on December 31, 1917, to be ascertained according to the system of accounting established by the Interstate Commerce Commission."

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Does the gentleman by his amendment mean 7 per cent on the par value or on the market value of the stock?

Mr. DILLON. The par value.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. When certain stock has been selling at 200 or 300, and people have bought and sold it for 20 or 30 years, do you expect to give them only 7 per cent on the par value?

Mr. DILLON. On the par value of the stock, so far as the guaranty is concerned; yet I would allow the carrier the full net value of the use of the property.

Mr. CALDWELL rose.

Mr. DILLON. If the gentleman will permit me, I want to explain my substitute, and do not want all of my time taken up. The substitute I offer is, in effect, the same as that of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL], except that my substitute goes to the question of the guaranty. It allows the carrier to have all that is coming to it. We should limit the responsibility of the Government as to the guaranty but pay the full value of the use, and my substitute seeks to limit the guaranty of the Government to 7 per cent. These carriers are engaged in a public service, and the Government could require them to turn back all sums above a fair and reasonable return on the money invested in a public service. Some of these companies are earning large sums of money. About 66 per cent of the mileage are earning good profits, and a great number of the carriers are earning excessive profits. I see no good reason why the Government in time of war should guarantee to them more than 7 per cent. The other third of the mileage of the railroads of this country are earning but little, and many of them earn nothing. These short lines that have been brought in under the terms of the bill will earn but little, if anything. The Government ought not to be mulcted in $175,000,000 annually upon a guaranty. It does not guarantee your business; it does not guarantee my business. Then why should the Government guarantee these roads that are making excessive profits more than 7 per cent? It seems to me my amendment ought to have the support of everyone present. The Government ought not to extend its guaranty beyond 7 per cent, yet it ought to pay the full net value of the use of the property it has taken. No good argument can be offered here to show that the Government ought in its guaranty to go above 7 per cent. If the companies earn 30 per cent or 50 per cent, let them have the money; but from 7 per cent up to the earning capacity let them bear the perils and losses of war, the same as the balance of the people are doing. I trust my substitute will be adopted, that we may thus limit the responsibility of the Government as against the carriers that are making excessive profits. [Applause.]

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, this substitute sounds well for political campaign talk, but we do not want to lose sight of the fact that when you take a piece of property, and that property consists of a going business, that the man who surrendered his property to the Government is entitled to compensation for it. If you are going to use it pending that time, he is entitled to compensation for the use of it. The Supreme Court of the United States has held, not only once but a dozen times, that in taking into consideration what the value of the property is that is taken, we must not consider the value of the stock of the corporation; we are not to consider the par value of it nor the market value of it, but we must consider the value of the property itself, the value of the business, and in determining what is the value of the business the Supreme Court of the United States has repeatedly held that there must be taken into consideration together the going value as distinct from the good will, and also the good will, and in determining the value of the property aside from these intangible assets we must consider what the cost of reproduction under the conditions at the time it was taken were.

The gentleman's proposition might do very well if the Supreme Court had not decided what we can do and what we can not do under the Constitution. I take it that we should not pass a bill that the Supreme Court has said they would not sustain under the Constitution.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. Does the gentleman have in mind the case where the United States took over some railroad and the point was settled that it was the going value of the railroad?

Mr. CALDWELL. I have in mind the Consolidated Gas Co. case, where the whole matter was reviewed by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. LITTLE. Can the gentleman give the number of the volume containing the decision?

Mr. CALDWELL. No; I can not give it now, but I will put it in the RECORD. I also have in mind the waterworks cases in San Diego, and I think I recall one case that arose in the gentleman's own State of Kansas.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. It was in Nebraska.

Mr. CALDWELL. The gentleman from Nebraska says it was in Nebraska.

Mr. LITTLE. Does not the gentleman think that he confuses the necessities of the Government in a war like this with conditions in times of peace, where some property is taken for some other purpose?

Mr. CALDWELL. Not at all. Of course where they take property of the enemy, as they did in the Civil War, that is a different thing, but we are taking the property of our own people, and the Constitution of the United States says that we have to pay a fair value for it and has said what must be taken into consideration when we cast up the account.

Mr. LITTLE. But the gentleman will concede that there is another point involved in the use of property as a war measure.

Mr. CALDWELL. Oh, yes.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, in a general way I am in favor of the bill reported and of the Government taking over the control of the railroads of the United States. It seems to me, however, that there is merit in the amendments that have been proposed. They strike at the question of the compensation that the railroads shall receive. That compensation, under the language of the bill, is based on the earnings that the roads received for the last three years, probably the three most prosperous years in the history of the railroads in this country. Why, under the bill as it now is we may guarantee to one railroad profits of 25 per cent on the capital stock, to another 35 per cent, to another 44 per cent, and to numerous others amounts of returns nearly equal to those I have indicated, and in some instances even more.

In taking over these roads, shall we guarantee to a railroad profits sufficient to pay for the entire railroad capital stock in two years, in three years, or in four years? We do not treat other lines of business this way.

I realize that capital stock is not necessarily a true measure of value, but for determining the reasonable profits due the railroads other matters must be considered. But here we are too generous. Every Member of this House knows that as soon as the President issued his proclamation taking over the railroads, the market value of these securities jumped many per cent in the markets of our country. Why? Because the Government was proposing to underwrite for the period of the war profits for the railroads measured by the three prosperous railroad years through which we have just passed.

Gentlemen, I have read extensively on this subject. I have studied this question earnestly. I have listened to the able arguments by members of the committee, but as one Member of the House I am not satisfied with the compensation section of the bill.

It seems to me it is the duty of Congress to fix a compensation that would be, in the judgment of Congress, fair and equitable, and unless it is it will not be accepted. Then there is an opportunity under the terms of the bill for the matter to be determined in the courts. I remember in the fall I was, as we all were, in the liberty-loan campaign.

The argument that I met frequently was "I can earn more money than 4 per cent in loaning it to my neighbor who wants to borrow it." I replied immediately that the boys who are in the trenches could earn more than they drew from the Government if they were permitted to remain in this country and continue their normal occupations. It seems to me that we ought not to guarantee to the roads the highest compensation during this awful period of our country's crisis, the highest compensation they have earned during three most profitable years in the history of the railroad business, while we can not guarantee a profit at all to the hundreds of businesses throughout our country, and when in addition to that we are calling for the sacrifice of even life itself upon the part of a large number of our citizens.

I think that this Congress ought to consider legislation along the line suggested by the amendments that are now pending. They have just been offered. I am not sufficiently familiar with them in detail to know whether or not they ought to be approved by the Congress. That will be disclosed by further debate. It does seem to me, however, that they sound a note along the right line, and that we ought to consider seriously the proposition they suggest. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I hope that these amendments will both be defeated, both the amendment and the substitute.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. FRENCH. I notice in the report of the net earnings, as furnished by the Interstate Commerce Commission, some of the railroads of the country are reported as earning as much as 20 and 25 and even 70 per cent on their capital stock. According to that basis if we were to enter into a contract with them we would be paying for the entire valuation of the railroad in the course of two, three, or four years, and I would like to hear the gentleman discuss that.

Mr. SIMS. I thought the gentleman was going to ask me a question. I did not know that he was going to make a speech.

Mr. FRENCH. I would like to hear the gentleman on that proposition.

Mr. SIMS. Evidently the gentleman needs to hear somebody, because evidently he has not read up on the question.

Mr. FRENCH. I have read a great deal on the subject, and that is why I raise the question; and I listened to the gentleman in his able discussion on the general subject. He spent a great deal of time on other points, but not any on this. I must confess I am not satisfied.

Mr. SIMS. Take the Bessemer road. The mileage on the Bessemer road is only 8.81 miles, and its capital stock is only $500,000. The average earnings, net operating income, of that short road for the past three years amounted to over $4,000,000 a year, and therefore by reason of $500,000 capital only, the percentage would be enormous.

Mr. FRENCH. Six hundred per cent.

Mr. SIMS. Yes; but when you go into the facts you find that it controlled and operated 205 miles and that the actual property value of the road was over $45,000,000, and you find that the standard return would be a little over 10 per cent per annum for the three years upon the actual property investment, as shown by the reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission. It is not a question of capital stock. Ten shares could own the whole Pennsylvania road. Capital stock is nothing but a certificate of ownership. It is not a certificate of value at all. It is not even a fair estimate of what the value is; but the property used by the railroad in the discharge of its duties to the public is what you take upon which to calculate the percentage of return, and that value, that use for the three years on the property of more than $45,000,000, instead of being more than 600 per cent per annum, was a little over 10 per cent. What is the object of this provision? It is to authorize the President to make a contract with the railroads pending war control, to pay them for the use during the time the Government so uses them a return equal to the average net operating income of the roads for the three preceding years. One of those years was a very bad year, embracing 1914 and 1915. The other two were very good in the volume of business, and the net returns on the last two in gross were the largest they ever had, but the average of the three is very good. But you must remember that we are authorizing the President to make a contract not to exceed that return, and what is the use of authorizing him to make a contract that none of these good roads will make at all, when they can go into the courts and get just compensation by the decision of the court? What is the use of making a proposition that you know will be rejected?

We could put in a proposition here authorizing the President to make a contract for not to exceed 2 per cent on the capital stock, but it would be absurd to do that. It would be no less foolish to authorize him to make one for 10 per cent when you know in advance the railroad would not take it because they had been making 20. In the case of all these high returns on capital stock, it will be found in almost every instance that the outstanding stock is below the property value. There are bonds outstanding and all that sort of thing, and it is absurd, ridiculous, to authorize the President to make a contract which we know beforehand nobody who had any sense would enter into. It is absurd to authorize him to make contracts that can not and will not be entered into by the railroads. To turn over the use of these railroads for an unknown length of time to the Government with no agreement, and force the railroads to bring suit and litigate it to the end, what sort of shape would the country be in for the next—nobody knows how many years? It is to the interest of the people to get contracts, even if they pay more than the earnings may turn out to be, because it is a guess at best, and we must make the best guess that we can. Now, I want to plead with my friends on both sides, the friends of our country, not to force such a condition upon the country. You know that a short-time use of any property is always higher per diem or per annum than it is for a long period. The same is true about the borrowing of money.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SIMS. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. In one moment. If you go down here to a hotel and ask for a room for a day, you pay so much for it, for a week you pay less, for a month still less, and for a year much less. If you lease a piece of property for a long period of years, you get it for a less amount per annum than for a short time. When you borrow money on bonds for a long period of time the rate of interest is always less than for a short time. So I insist there is nothing inequitable and unjust in paying even more than the average would be for a long period of years in order to bring about an agreement, in order to prevent suits that would follow, and, furthermore, as has been often stated, to stabilize the value of railroad securities. I do not mean stocks, but bonds that are held by every bank, trust company, and insurance company in the United States—to keep the value from shrinking to an extent that a panic would come upon the country. Remember, these companies can not hold these bonds under the laws of the States whenever the value, in proportion to the debt secured, falls below a certain per cent of face value; and the holders would be forced to put those bonds upon the market and sell them out under the hammer for whatever they would bring. What is the use of fooling along here with a proposition trying to save money to the public that will result in nothing but further burdens and possible panic upon the country, that will wreck and ruin it at a time when we need the lowest possible rate of interest by which money can be obtained?

Mr. LITTLE. What about compensation to people whose trade and business were shut down during the late heatless-day order?

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman's question is not relevant. I do not mean to be anything but respectful, but it is not relevant.

Mr. LITTLE. I just state it is relevant.

Mr. SIMS. Well, the Government did not take over those plants and operate the property itself. The results did not go to the use of the Government.

Mr. LITTLE. If the Government would stop the railroads from running——

Mr. SIMS. But the Government did not take the property and use it, and there is no relevancy in that and where you take a piece of property for which under the circumstances you must make a just return. The people were simply told, "Do not burn coal." The Government got no benefit out of the heatless day or the meatless day.

Mr. LITTLE. Do I understand that if the Government just stopped the railroads from running it would not owe them anything?

Mr. SIMS. Why, if in the public interest they ordered a train not to go, which would be temporary and for the benefit of everybody, that would be a different question; but we are laying a foundation to make contracts, and the gentleman brings in the question of heatless day or meatless day when we are trying to get men——

Mr. LITTLE. That is the idea.

Mr. SIMS. To accept a contract for compensation——

Mr. LITTLE. That is right; that is the idea exactly; the gentleman has got my idea.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield for a relevant question? In the table prepared by the Interstate Commerce Commission and printed with the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] yesterday he gives the percentage of net income on these various roads.

Mr. SIMS. On what?

Mr. RAMSEYER. On capitalization.

Mr. SIMS. On stock?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes, sir.

Mr. SIMS. All right; go ahead.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Now, here is the Lehigh road, 27.98.

Mr. SIMS. On the stock?

Mr. RAMSEYER. That means that the stockholders are getting that much upon the face value of their stock, does it not?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Now, in regard to Bessemer, that means that the fellows who own the stock, not the bonds, will get 647 per cent?

Mr. SIMS. I told you that.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I understood in the gentleman's answer to the gentleman from Idaho that this Bessemer business in fact only got 10 per cent.

Mr. SIMS. On the value of the property used in making those earnings.

Mr. RAMSEYER. But the fellows who own the bonds only get 4 per cent.

Mr. SIMS. That is a liability and not capital.

Mr. RAMSEYER. But there is somebody getting these high rates of income on dividends or capital stock, and if the President compels the return, which he is entitled to make under this bill, then we will have the Burlington Road stockholders getting 22 per cent.

Mr. SIMS. I have read over all of that and know what it is, but the return is based in these reports on the stock value and not the value of the property devoted to the public use.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I know that.

Mr. SIMS. That is the standard return, and not on stock issued. It is on the value of the property used in the service.

Mr. RAMSEYER. You are not increasing the interest rate of the bondholders?

Mr. SIMS. That has nothing to do with it.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Certainly not, but you are giving these stockholders the percentages they have been receiving.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired.

The question is on the amendment by way of substitute.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, may I ask that the substitute be read?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the substitute will be again read.

The substitute was again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment by way of a substitute.

The amendment by way of a substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL].

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I ask that the amendment be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it will be again reported.

The amendment was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 15, noes 40.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PARKER of New Jersey: Insert after the paragraph as to taxes, ending with line 2, on page 4, the following:

"Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to admit the right of the several States, directly or indirectly, to tax war business conducted by the United States, or increased values of property, or franchises, or increased operating revenue resulting from such war business, and in order to prevent increase or diminution of taxes payable to the several States or under the several State laws by reason of the said war business and Federal control during the period of Federal control such taxes shall be standardized at the sums which were assessed and payable by said carriers, respectively, in the calendar year 1917, to be payable in each year at the same time and in the same amount as they were in 1917, adding thereto any taxes which were assessed in the year 1917 upon real estate that shall have been acquired by such carrier while under Federal control or by the United States for the purposes of this act."

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I thank the gentleman for reserving it. I wanted to bring the matter before the House. I think it is not subject to a point of order; but, nevertheless, it is a very important matter that ought to be considered. I think myself, Mr. Chairman, that this amendment ought to be divided. I have had it read all at once, so that it should be understood. The first part of it states a general principle:

That nothing herein contained shall be construed to admit the right of the several States, directly or indirectly, to tax war business conducted by the United States, or increased values of property, or franchises, or increased operating revenue resulting from such war business.

I think everybody will admit that to be right on the decisions of the courts. There was a brief put in on this matter. On page 885 Mr. Anderson said that if the States undertook to increase taxation disproportionately or to levy new taxes, that they would not have levied if the money were not coming from the Federal Treasury, the Government would not be helpless. It can protect itself by litigating and testing its constitutionality.

Mr. Folk, at Mr. Anderson's suggestion, I think, put in a brief on this subject, which is on page 913. It goes over this matter very thoroughly. It says that operations of the United States can not be taxed at all. It shows that, for instance, national banks were exempted from certain State taxation because they were agencies of the United States. The brief on that subject is very full. I think that there ought to be no one in this House that would not vote for that statement that we did not intend to have the war business performed by the Government taxed by anybody. I have already put before the committee in the general debate the fact that the increase of business of the railroads during the time of the Civil War was to two and one-half fold. It is likely to be the same now.

There are States that, without changing any law, as they tax gross receipts, would get two and one-half times as much taxes as they do now because of the Government running those railroads. If rates are raised they will get more yet. If some of the States choose to increase their rate of taxation or increase their valuation of the railroads they will get more yet.

Now, the remedy proposed by Mr. Anderson is that we should go into litigation about all this. Nothing more awful could happen than if the United States and the States were to become involved in litigation about the taxes imposed on the railroads. The States, or some of them, may be quite patriotic and may not raise the valuation; but even if the States should be patriotic, the custom is in some of the States to put a tax on gross receipts, and in that case their revenues would increase, while that patriotic States which only value the railroads would have the same amount paid as heretofore.

Now, I say that the principle, down to the end of what I read, ought to be admitted by every one. The rest of the amendment is a remedy. Whether the remedy is the right one or not I do not know. But I do think that if we can standardize against the railroads their rental value and say, "We do not care how much you are going to take in during the war or what profits you make, we will pay you exactly what you made before the war for the use of your property," I think we can likewise standardize the peace taxes collected by the States and municipalities and say, as I do in the second part of this amendment, "The United States will pay exactly what you were assessed in 1917, whether you do less business or more."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I ask, Mr. Chairman, that the matter be considered and voted on in two halves, as I mentioned, the first down to the words "war business," in the fourth line. Consider that as one amendment and the rest of it as a separate remedy. I think they ought to be considered separately. One is the principle and the other is the remedy.

The CHAIRMAN. A point of order has been reserved on the amendment as offered.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. No point of order has been made as to the first part of the amendment.

Mr. SIMS. It was read as one amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment was offered as one amendment.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I offer it as two. The first part reads:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to admit the right of the several States directly or indirectly to tax war business conducted by the United States, or increased values of property, or franchises, or increased operating revenue resulting from such a war business.

That is all.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that is germane to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee make a point of order on the amendment?

Mr. SIMS. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, is the other portion offered now?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. This is a section about taxes. There is on page 3, at the end of the paragraph, a passage which says:

that other taxes assessed under Federal or any other governmental authority for the period of Federal control or any part thereof, either on the property used under such Federal control or on the right to operate as a carrier, or on the revenues or any part thereof derived from operation (not including, however, assessments for public improvements or taxes assessed on property under construction and chargeable under the classification of the Interstate Commerce Commission to investment in road and equipment), shall be paid out of revenues derived from railway operations while under Federal control.

"Other governmental authority" means the States. I therefore add at the end a proviso to the effect that "Nothing herein contained shall be construed to admit the right of the several States directly or indirectly to tax war business conducted by the United States, or increased values of property, or franchises, or increased operating revenue resulting from such war business" conducted by the Federal Government. I think it is germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state to the gentleman from New Jersey that the amendment which was proposed was offered as a whole. Of course the gentleman from New Jersey is perfectly familiar with the rule that if any part of an amendment be subject to a point of order, that makes the entire amendment subject to the point of order.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I offered the first part myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PARKER of New Jersey: Insert, after the paragraph as to taxes, ending with line 2, on page 4, the following: "Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to admit the right of the several States, directly or indirectly, to tax war business conducted by the United States, or increased values of property, or franchises, or increased operating revenue resulting from such war business."

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I make the same point of order against that amendment. It is not germane to the bill or to any provision in the bill. That is putting a provision in with reference to State taxes. There is nothing in the bill attempting to control or regulate State taxation. The provision in the bill for taxing has reference to what may or may not be paid out of the standard return or out of the net operating revenue of the road.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. The gentleman understands that "other governmental authority" means the State. It was so stated in the evidence.

Mr. SIMS. But that has reference alone to the disposition to be made as to the earnings of the railroad, not as to the power to tax or not to tax.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. It is only a proviso, which can not be misunderstood.

Mr. LENROOT. Later on in the bill there is an express provision that this shall not impair the right of the State to levy taxes.

Mr. SIMS. Why, certainly. That was put in on account of the demand of the States, because they were afraid.

Mr. BARKLEY. Just one suggestion, if the Chair will accept it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. BARKLEY. This section 1 simply provides a method by which taxes levied by the States shall be paid, how the tax shall be deducted. It makes no attempt whatever to limit or extend the authority of the States in levying taxes. The gentleman's amendment, though, is not germane, because it seeks to limit the power of the States to levy taxes, whereas the section simply states how these taxes are to be paid and out of what fund they are to be paid.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee). The Chair thinks the statement of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] very clearly puts the situation, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do this for the purpose of addressing an inquiry to the chairman of the committee. I note on page 2 of this bill language that perhaps is plain to the committee but is ambiguous to me. The statement is made that—

For each year, and pro rata for any fractional year of such Federal control, equivalent as nearly as may be to its average annual railway operating income—

What is that, gross or net?

Mr. SIMS. Net.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Does not the gentleman think that as a safety provision he ought so to state; that instead of leaving this to the construction of some court, he had better insert the word "net" by way of amendment? This language is capable of a double construction, and possibly some court somewhere might contend that this was gross.

Mr. SIMS. Undoubtedly the courts would hold that that had reference to net income. A court that would hold that the Government should pay to the railroad company the entire gross income of the railroad company as compensation for its use for three years ought to be relieved of its judicial duties.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. It will not hurt the gentleman's bill, and it might make the meaning clear.

Mr. SIMS. It can not possibly refer to gross income, by construction or otherwise.

Mr. STEVENSON. If the gentleman will look, he will find that they have used there exactly the term that the Interstate Commerce Commission uses in all of its reports and deliverances, and in the reports that it requires of net operating income. The exact term that the Interstate Commerce Commission has crystalized into that expression is used here to denote the net operating income.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. In other words, the term "operating income" means net income, does it?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes; that is what it means. You will find that there is a certain report required of every railroad of its income, and the part designated as operating income is the thing which they refer to here, the net operating income.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. If it has a well-known meaning, the amendment is not necessary, but it was not clear to my mind.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment to correct an error of punctuation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. ESCH. After the word "retirements," in line 12, page 2, I move to insert a comma; and after the word "betterments," in line 11, omit the comma.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ESCH: Page 2, line 11, after the word "betterments," strike out the comma; and, in line 12, after the word "retirements," insert a comma.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I understand the gentleman from Wisconsin is going to offer some amendments to perfect the section, and especially the first paragraph of the section. I will ask the gentleman from Wisconsin to be kind enough to notify me when he exhausts his amendments to the first section, because I have an amendment to offer.

Mr. SIMS. Let me ask the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] if the amendments are the ones he stated that he would offer yesterday.

Mr. LENROOT. This is not one inserted in the RECORD, but one that I said I would offer.

Mr. SIMS. As to these amendments I would like to have them offered, because the committee wants tomorrow to study these matters.

Mr. LENROOT. I would be glad to have an agreement that as to these perfecting amendments we have unanimous consent to return to the first section of the bill.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I will ask unanimous consent that we may return to section 1 of the bill for the purpose of giving the gentleman from Wisconsin an opportunity to offer amendments and discuss them as though they were offered now.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I have a motion to strike out the first paragraph of the section and insert a substitute therefor, and I could not offer it until after the section is perfected and the amendments disposed of.

Mr. SIMS. Let me inquire of the gentleman from Wisconsin how many amendments he has to offer to the first section.

Mr. LENROOT. Four.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman might offer his substitute now, because the amendments, as I understand, do not change the scope of the section. If the substitute is adopted gentlemen might want to offer some amendments to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimouse consent that at any time before the conclusion of the consideration of the bill in Committee of the Whole the committee may return to section 1 of the bill in order to permit the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] to offer and debate amendments under the general rules of the House for the perfecting of the section. Is there objection?

Mr. CALDWELL. Reserving the right to object, does the request confine amendments to be offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] and no one else?

Mr. SIMS. Not if anyone else wants to offer amendments to perfect the section.

Mr. LENROOT. I have inserted nearly all my amendments in the RECORD. The purpose of this was to give the committee time for the consideration of those amendments, and they have already had notice of the amendments.

Mr. CALDWELL. I shall have to insist on an objection unless the unanimous-consent agreement provides that anyone can offer an amendment. Suppose an amendment is offered and some one wants to offer another amendment to it?

Mr. LENROOT. They can go on and do that.

Mr. CALDWELL. I will object.

Mr. LENROOT. Then, Mr. Chairman, I will offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 10, strike out the words "not exceeding." Page 2, lines 2 and 3, strike out the words "equivalent as nearly as may be to" and insert the words "not exceeding."

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, that is one amendment that I gave notice yesterday that I would offer at this time. As the language now stands it clearly does not express the intention of the committee. As the language now stands it could not possibly accomplish the purpose of the committee. Of course, the purpose of the committee in this first paragraph, section 1, was to authorize the President to agree with the railroads to pay them a certain annual sum in compensation for the use of their roads by the Government during the time the Government shall hold them.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield for me to withdraw my objection?

Mr. LENROOT. I will.

Mr. SIMS. Then, Mr. Chairman, I renew my request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that at any time during the consideration of the bill the Committee of the Whole may return to section 1 for the purpose of permitting the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr LENROOT] to offer and debate any amendment intending to perfect the verbiage of the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman is it the exclusive privilege of the gentleman from Wisconsin to offer an amendment, or any member of the committee?

Mr. SIMS. Any amendment can be offered to his amendment.

Mr. GARNER. I understand, but I do not grasp the idea of returning for one member of the committee only to offer an amendment; why not leave it open to all?

Mr. SIMS. Was the gentleman present when I stated my reason for this?

Mr. GARNER. No; I was not.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] made a speech of 40 minutes on yesterday and submitted a number of amendments, many of which are to noncontroverted portions of the bill, to perfect the bill and clarify it, but not in opposition to the bill.

They are printed in the RECORD. The committee has had no opportunity at all to consider these amendments, and I suggest that if he would withhold offering the amendment it would give an opportunity to the committee to-morrow and on Monday morning to take them and consider them, and it would very greatly expedite the passage of the bill.

Mr. LENROOT. And save time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would hold, of course, that an amendment to any amendment that was offered would be in order.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, ought not that request to include in it that the return shall be upon the motion of some particular Member?

Mr. SIMS. It says "before the conclusion of the bill."

Mr. LENROOT. I think it would amount to the same thing if the gentleman would make his request that we return to section 1 later for the purpose only of offering perfecting amendments, and that would leave it open to any gentleman to offer amendments.

Mr. SIMS. I will put the request exactly in that shape, that the committee may return to section 1 at any time upon the request of any member of the Committee of the Whole to offer perfecting amendments to section 1.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that at any time during the consideration of the bill in Committee of the Whole, upon the request of any member of the Committee of the Whole, the committee shall return to section 1 of the bill for the purpose of permitting the offering of amendments to perfect the text of the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I understand the only purpose of this is to permit the committee to consider these amendments so that when we convene on Monday they may have them better in mind. Therefore to give them an opportunity to do that, without any further agreement or arrangement, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman desires to make the point of no quorum, he may do so. I do not know whether there is a quorum here or not, but the point will be made again in a few moments, and under compulsion of that kind I move that the committee do now rise, and for no other reason.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia having assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 9685, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. SABATH, for three days, on account of important business.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing therein a letter directed to the President, calling his attention to the unsettled condition of the farmers under the present draft and the reply of the Provost Marshal General thereto, giving their status.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, is the letter from a farmer or an association of farmers?

Mr. McKEOWN. The letter is addressed by myself to the President, and he has turned it over to the Provost Marshal General, who answered it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

HOUR OF MEETING MONDAY.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock Monday.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SIMS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 32 minutes p. m.) the House, in accordance with the order heretofore made, adjourned until Monday, February 25, 1918, at 11 o'clock a. m.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

SENATE.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Thou art the sovereign Lord and Master of all men and of all nations. We thank Thee that we have been taught to recognize Thy right to rule in our hearts and lives and in our Nation; that we think of our allegiance to Thee, our loyalty to Thy cause, our devotion to Thy name as the first and supreme obligation of life. We pray Thee that Thou wilt bless us as we come day by day to draw from Thee the wisdom and grace for the duties that are upon us. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Thursday, February 21, 1918, when, on request of Mr. MCCUMBER and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

ESTIMATES OF APPROPRIATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of War submitting an estimate of appropriation in the sum of $4,506,997.30 for the temporary employment of additional employees in the War Department (S. Doc. No. 184), which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of War submitting supplemental estimates of appropriations required by the Quartermaster Corps for the fiscal year 1918, $398,140 (S. Doc. No. 182), which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of War submitting an urgent estimate of appropriation in the sum of $50,000, required by the Engineer Department for "Maintenance of Highway Bridge across the Potomac River, District of Columbia," etc. (S. Doc. No. 181), which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, submitting an estimate of appropriation in the sum of $300,000 to enforce, through the Customs Service, the provisions of the espionage law (S. Doc. No. 183), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

FOOD INVESTIGATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the acting chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, transmitting a copy of the hearings held by the commission in connection with the food investigation directed by the President, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Printing.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER OF PATENTS (H. DOC. NO. 958).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the annual report of the Commissioner of Patents for the fiscal year ended December 31, 1917, which was referred to the Committee on Patents and ordered to be printed.

ADDRESS ON WASHINGTON'S BIRTHDAY BY SENATOR WARREN G. HARDING (S. DOC. NO. 180).

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have before me the manuscript of an address delivered by my distinguished colleague on Washington's Birthday at a celebration held under the auspices of the Sons of the American Revolution. It is a splendid address, worthy of the occasion, and I ask that it be printed as a public document.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I rose to make the same request with reference to the address of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING]. Among the celebrations held throughout the country appropriate to Washington's Birthday there was none more fitting than the celebration held here under the auspices of the Sons of the American Revolution, and the address of the Senator from Ohio upon that occasion was most illuminating and inspiring. It was in every way becoming that occasion, and I join with the senior Senator from Ohio in his request to have this address printed as a document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ADDRESS ON THE EXISTING WAR.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that to-morrow, immediately following the conclusion of the regular morning business, I shall address the Senate on the existing war.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented resolutions of the Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF MONTANA,
SECRETARY OF STATE,
Helena, February 19, 1918.

Hon. THOMAS MARSHALL,
President of United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am herewith transmitting copy of substitute joint house resolution No. 3, passed by the extraordinary session of the Fifteenth Legislature Assembly of the State of Montana.

Yours, very truly,
C. T. STEWART,
Secretary of State.

DEPARTMENT OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE OF THE STATE OF MONTANA.

CERTIFICATE.

United States of America, State of Montana, ss:

I, C. T. Stewart, secretary of state of the State of Montana, do hereby certify that I have compared the annexed copy of substitute joint house resolution No. 3 with the original thereof, filed in my office on the 19th day of February, 1918, and that the same is a correct transcript thereof, and of the whole of said original.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State of Montana this 19th day of February, A. D. 1918.

[SEAL.]
C. T. STEWART,
Secretary of State.

[Substitute joint house resolution No. 3, introduced by Harbert, Mason, and Larse.]

A resolution memorializing Congress for an appropriation of $750,000 for the Flathead irrigation project for the ensuing year.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives in the Congress of the United States assembled:

Whereas the Fifteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, meeting in extraordinary session in response to a proclamation of the governor calling this body together for the consideration of measures necessary to a successful prosecution of the war, among which of primary importance is a bill providing for loans at low rates of interest to needy farmers for the enhancement of agricultural production in the State: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Fifteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana hears with grave concern the reports from Washington of the intention of Congress to reduce a contemplated appropriation of $750,000 toward the completion of the Flathead Reservation irrigation project in western Montana to $250,000, and does hereby go on record as in favor of and registers its wish for an appropriation of $750,000 for said project; and it is further

Resolved, That a failure of the Congress of the United States to make such appropriation of $750,000 would be violative of the best interests of this Nation, a great discouragement to the farmers and to the farming interests of Montana, thereby resulting in decreased farm production in one of the most fertile sections of the State of Montana, and, being prompted by a consideration for the best interests of this Nation and the State of Montana, demands favorable action by the United States Congress of an appropriation of $750,000 toward the completion of the Flathead Reservation irrigation project; and it is hereby ordered that a copy of this resolution be telegraphed to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the President of the United States Senate, with the recommendation that it be read before both bodies and referred to the proper committees.

(Signed) JAMES F. O'CONNOR,
Speaker of the House.
(Signed) W. W. MCDOWELL,
President of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented resolutions of the Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF MONTANA,
SECRETARY OF STATE,
Helena, February 19, 1918.

Hon. THOMAS MARSHALL,
President United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am transmitting herewith copy of resolution passed by the Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, which resolution relates to the Myers homestead bill (S. 3439), and the same is self-explanatory.

Very truly, yours,
C. T. STEWART,
Secretary of State.

State of Montana, ss:

I, C. T. Stewart, secretary of state of the State of Montana, do hereby certify that I have compared the annexed copy of resolution memorializing Congress for the passage of Senate bill No. 3439, with the original thereof filed in my office on the 19th day of February, 1918, and that the same is a correct transcript thereof and of the whole of said original.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State of Montana this 19th day of February, A. D. 1918.

[SEAL.] C. T. STEWART,
Secretary of State.

A resolution memorializing Congress for the passage of Senate bill No. 3439 in the interest of increased food production in the United States.

Whereas the Government of the United States is in need of increased production along all lines, and particularly increased production in foodstuffs, for the purpose of successfully prosecuting the war; and

Whereas there are now more than 100,000 homestead settlers in the Northwest, many of whom, on account of the short crop of 1917, are without seed grain and have not sufficient credit to purchase such seed and have not sufficient credit to enable them to live and carry on their farming operations until the crop of 1918 shall have been harvested; and

Whereas the granting of title to such settlers will enable them to borrow sufficient funds to carry on their farming operations and will add many millions of bushels to the production of grain and other food products in 1918: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the Fifteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana in extraordinary session assembled (the house concurring herein), That we petition the Congress of the United States to pass Senate bill No. 3439, introduced by the Hon. HENRY L. MYERS, United States Senator from the State of Montana, which bill is a bill for the relief of homesteaders and desert-land entrymen in the United States;

Resolved further, That a copy of this memorial be forwarded by the secretary of the State of Montana to the Senate of the United States and that a copy of this memorial be forwarded by the secretary of the State of Montana to the House of Representatives of the United States; And be it further

Resolved, That a copy hereof be transmitted by the secretary of state of the State of Montana to the Senators and Representatives in Congress of the State of Montana, with the request that they use every effort within their power to bring about a speedy action for the accomplishment of the ends and purposes herein indicated.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented resolutions adopted by the Legislature of the State of South Carolina, ratifying the national prohibition amendment, which were ordered to be filed and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA, EXECUTIVE CHAMBER,
Columbia, February 19, 1918.

Hon. THOMAS R. MARSHALL,
President of the Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. MARSHALL: In accordance with the provisions of the joint resolution ratified by the South Carolina Legislature, I have the honor to transmit herewith a true copy of the said preamble and resolution. The title of the resolution is as follows:

"A joint resolution ratifying a proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States of America, prohibiting the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof, for beverage purposes, and to provide means for the enforcement thereof."

With high esteem and personal regards, I am,

Cordially, yours,

RICHD. I. MANNING, Governor.

[No. 97—Acts of 1918.]

A joint resolution ratifying a proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States of America, prohibiting the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof, for beverage purposes, and to provide means for the enforcement thereof.

Whereas both Houses of the Sixty-fifth Congress of the United States of America, by a constitutional majority of two-thirds thereof, made the following proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States of America in the following words, to wit:

"A joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

"SECTION 1. Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following amendment to the Constitution be, and hereby is, proposed to the States, to become valid as a part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of the several States, as provided by the Constitution:

"ARTICLE —.

"SECTION 1. After one year from the ratification of this article the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof, for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited.

"SEC. 2. The Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

"SEC. 3. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of the several States as provided by the Constitution within seven years from the date of the submission hereof to the States by the Congress": Therefore be it

SECTION 1. Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of South Carolina, That the said proposed amendment of the Constitution of the United States of America be, and the same is hereby, ratified by the General Assembly of the State of South Carolina.

SEC. 2. That certified copies of this preamble and joint resolution be forwarded by the governor of this State to the Secretary of State at Washington, to the Presiding Officer of the United States Senate, and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States.

In the senate house the 8th day of February, A. D. 1918.

ANDREW J. BETHEA,
President of the Senate.
T. P. COTHRAN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Approved the 12th day of February, A. D. 1918.

RICHARD I. MANNING, Governor.

A true copy.

JOHN ELLIOT PUCKETTE,
Secretary to the Governor.

Mr. LODGE. I present resolutions of the Legislature of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS,
In the year one thousand nine hundred and eighteen.

Resolutions in favor of the creation of a league of nations to safeguard permanent peace upon the termination of the present war.

Whereas the President of the United States has declared that our present and immediate task is to win the war; and

Whereas he has proclaimed that the chief aim of the war is to secure a permanent peace guaranteed by a partnership of free nations: Therefore be it

Resolved by the General Court of Massachusetts, That the Commonwealth of Massachusetts pledges all its resources to the vigorous prosecution of the war until Prussian autocracy has been defeated; and be it further

Resolved, That the Commonwealth of Massachusetts favors the entrance of the United States after the war into a league of nations to safeguard the peace that must be won by the joint military forces of the allied nations; and be it further

Resolved, That certified copies of these resolutions be sent by the secretary of the Commonwealth to the President and to the Presiding Officers of both branches of Congress and to each of the Senators and Representatives from Massachusetts.

In the house of representatives, adopted, February 6, 1918.
In senate, adopted, in concurrence, February 11, 1918.
A true copy.
Attest:

ALBERT P. LANGTRY,
Secretary of the Commonwealth.

Mr. LODGE. I present resolutions of the Legislature of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS,
In the year 1918.

Resolutions in favor of the ratification of regulations establishing a closed season on waterfowl.

Resolved, That the General Court of Massachusetts favors the approval and ratification of the regulations recommended by the Bureau of Biological Survey of the United States Department of Agriculture on the 13th day of May, 1916, in pursuance of an act of Congress providing for a closed season on waterfowl in Massachusetts between the 16th day of January and the 30th day of September, said regulations being ineffective, owing to their not being approved and ratified on August 16, 1916.

Resolved, That the General Court of Massachusetts favors the ratification of the aforesaid regulations and requests its Senators and Representatives in Congress to take such steps as may be necessary to secure the approval and adoption of said regulations.

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be sent by the Secretary of the Commonwealth to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from Massachusetts and to the Bureau of Biological Survey of the United States Department of Agriculture.

In house of representatives, adopted, February 7, 1918.
In Senate, adopted in concurrence, February 12, 1918.
A true copy. Attest:

ALBERT P. LANGTRY,
Secretary of the Commonwealth.

Mr. LODGE presented a petition of the City Council of Cambridge, Mass., praying for the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the National Association of Merchant Tailors of America, pledging their loyal support to the Government in the prosecution of the war and favoring the establishment of a league of nations at the expiration of the war, so as to insure a permanent world peace; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the Massachusetts prohibition State committee, praying for the adoption of national prohibition as a war measure, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the City Council of Malden, Mass., favoring the acquisition and control of coal mines by the Government during the period of the war, which were referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

He also presented a memorial of the Massachusetts Dairymen's Association, of Amherst, Mass., remonstrating against any change in the present laws relative to the manufacture, sale, or tax on oleomargarine, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. POMERENE. I have a memorial in the nature of a petition addressed to Congress by the governor of my State in his individual capacity on the subject of the woman-suffrage constitutional amendment. I ask that it be incorporated in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the memorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Memorial to the Sixty-fifth Congress of the United States.

In view of the fact that one-quarter of the States of the Union have now extended full suffrage to women; and

In view of the fact that since the war began suffrage has been granted or pledged to the women of Canada, Great Britain, Russia, and France; and

In view of the fact that every State and country which has tried woman suffrage gives unanimous evidence that the women voters have proved a positive force for good:

We, the undersigned, believe that when the world is fighting for democracy—"the right of those who submit to authority to have a voice in their own government"—the time has come to take steps insuring political freedom to the women of the entire United States, and we therefore unite in asking the Sixty-fifth Congress to submit a Federal suffrage amendment to be ratified by the legislatures of the several States.

JAMES M. COX, Dayton, Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. I also have two series of resolutions from the Civic Council of the city of Cleveland, one relating to Government ownership of the telegraph and telephone systems of the country and the other relating to the liberation of Slavic races in Austria-Hungary. I ask that they be published in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the telephone and telegraph service now given by private companies is inefficient and unsatisfactory; and

Whereas in many cities, Cleveland among them, the private ownership of this important means of communication has led to duplication and consequent waste, which has resulted in further increases in already exorbitant charges; and

Whereas the telephone and telegraph systems are an essential part of the means of communication, and as such should be owned and operated by the United States Government as part of the Postal System: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Council of the City of Cleveland, State of Ohio, That we urge the Congress of the United States to take immediate action toward acquiring ownership of the telephone and telegraph systems of the country and operating same as one unified system; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the Congressmen from the twentieth, twenty-first, and twenty-second districts and to the Senators from the State of Ohio.

Adopted by the council February 4, 1918.
Approved by the mayor February 8, 1918.

I, C. J. Benkoski, clerk of Council of the City of Cleveland, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of resolution (file No. 46213) adopted by the Council of the City of Cleveland February 4, 1918.

Witness my hand and seal at Cleveland, Ohio, this 14th day of February, A. D. 1918.

[SEAL.] C. J. BENKOSKI,
Clerk of Council of the City of Cleveland.

Whereas the President of the United States at the beginning of the hostilities between the United States and Germany solemnly declared that one of the aims of the United States will be the liberation of all Slavic races from the tyranny of the Hapsburg dynasty, and explicitly named Bohemians and Slovaks as the nations first to be considered among Slavic nationalities of Austria-Hungary to be independent free States; and

Whereas the President of the United States has again lately stated his war aims and named 14 conditions which must be considered in making peace between the allies and central powers, one of the conditions being the liberation of Poland; and

Whereas Cleveland is a great cosmopolitan city, about 165,000 of the inhabitants being Bohemians and Slovaks (Czecho-Slovak), who are patriotic and loyal to their adopted country and lovers of liberty and law-abiding citizens: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Council of the City of Cleveland, State of Ohio, That the Council of the City of Cleveland request the President of the United States and Congress to consider the freedom of Bohemia-Slovak (Czecho-Slovak) subjects as a free and separate nation, as tens of thousands of these subjects are now in the ranks of the allies fighting for our President's aims. Be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the President, Senate, and House of Representatives.

Adopted by the council February 4, 1918.
Approved by the mayor February 8, 1918.

I, C. J. Benkoski, clerk of Council of the City of Cleveland, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of resolution (file No. 46288) adopted by the Council of the City of Cleveland February 4, 1918.

Witness my hand and seal, at Cleveland Ohio, this 14th day of February, A. D. 1918.

[SEAL.] C. J. BENKOSKI,
Clerk of Council of the City of Cleveland.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented a memorial of the congregation of the Sherman Street Christian Reformed Church, of Grand Rapids, Mich., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation granting certain protection to secret organizations, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a petition of Local Lodge No. 29, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, of Battle Creek, Mich., praying that proper conditions may be maintained in the prosecution of the war, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented memorials of the Woman's Home Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church of St. Joseph, of the congregation of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Ludington, and of sundry citizens of Lansing, all in the State of Michigan, remonstrating against the running of railroad tracks directly opposite the Lucy Webb Hayes Training School and the Sibley Memorial Hospital, in the city of Washington, D. C., which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented a petition of Fairfield Grange, No. 278, Patrons of Husbandry, of Jasper, Mich., praying for the enactment of legislation authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase at par the 4½ per cent bonds issued by the Federal Loan Banks, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of Woodbury Post, No. 45, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Michigan, of Adrian, Mich., praying for an increase of pensions to veterans of the Civil War, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of the Federation of Labor of Detroit, Mich., and a petition of sundry citizens of Hillsdale, Mich., praying for an increase in the salaries of postal employees, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. ROBINSON presented a petition of Local Union No. 576, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners, of Pine Bluff, Ark., praying for Government supervision or ownership of telephone and telegraph systems, and also for the operation of coal mines, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. MYERS presented a petition of the Board of County Commissioners of Teton County, Mont., praying for the enactment of legislation granting certain rights and issuing certain patents to settlers upon reclamation projects in that State, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. OVERMAN, from the Committee on Appropriations, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 9314) making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 287) thereon.

CLAIMS OF INDIANS IN OREGON.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, on the 18th of January I introduced a bill (S. 3972) authorizing the Coos Bay, Umpqua, and Siuslaw Tribes of Indians in the State of Oregon to submit claims to the Court of Claims, and I asked that it be referred to the Committee on Claims, which was done. After considering the matter further, I am of the opinion that it should be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, inasmuch as it affects the legislative consideration of the welfare of these Indians. I ask that the Committee on Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 3935) to prohibit the sale, manufacture, and importation of intoxicating liquors in the Territory of Hawaii during the period of the war, except as hereinafter provided; to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico.

By Mr. LODGE:

A bill (S. 3936) to provide temporary increased rank for officers of the United States Coast Guard while operating as a part of the Navy during the period of the present war, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. SMOOT:

A bill (S. 3937) granting an increase of pension to Rosanna Miller (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. JONES of Washington:

A bill (S. 3938) to survey and locate a military and post road from St. Louis, Mo., to Olympia, Wash.; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 3939) to establish a fish-cultural station in the State of Washington; to the Committee on Fisheries.

A bill (S. 3940) validating and confirming conveyances of lands made by allottees on the Yakima Indian Reservation, in the State of Washington; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

A bill (S. 3941) authorizing the setting aside of certain lands for highway purposes through the public domain, forests, and other reserves of the United States; and

A bill (S. 3942) making timberlands available for homestead settlement, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. MYERS:

A bill (S. 3943) to provide for the disposition of public lands withdrawn and improved under the provisions of the reclamation laws, and which are no longer needed in connection with said laws; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. CALDER:

A bill (S. 3944) for the relief of Emma H. Ridley; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. KENYON:

A bill (S. 3945) to authorize the President of the United States to appoint Fred H. Gallup, major of Field Artillery in the United States Army (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 3946) granting an increase of pension to Warren M. Easton (with accompanying paper); and

A bill (S. 3947) granting an increase of pension to John F. Loehr (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CURTIS:

A bill (S. 3948) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to adjudicate claims covering the expense of removing certain Choctaw Indians from Mississippi to Oklahoma (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. PENROSE:

A bill (S. 3949) granting a pension to John Cunningham (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 3950) granting an increase of pension to Josiah Weaver; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. STONE:

A bill (S. 3951) granting an increase of pension to August Schaeffer (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. LEWIS:

A bill (S. 3952) creating a Bureau of Farm Colonization to make a national survey of all public lands suitable for farming, to develop, establish, and maintain in a practical manner rural colonies and farm homes for qualified families; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

COMMISSIONED OFFICERS IN THE ARMY.

Mr. OWEN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3748) fixing the grades of the commissioned officers of the Medical Corps and of the Medical Reserve Corps of the United States Army on active duty, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MYERS submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $9,117 to pay to Katherine Macdonald, of Butte, Mont., for and on account of unpaid claims held by her on account of work and services performed on or supplies furnished for the construction of the Corbett Tunnel, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the urgent deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LODGE submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $7,050.37 to reimburse the State of Massachusetts for expenses incurred for supplying State troops at the request of the United States marshal at Boston for guard and patrol duty at Boston Harbor, in the interest of the Federal Government, intended to be proposed by him to the urgent deficiency appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA TELEPHONE SYSTEM.

Mr. KING. I send to the desk a resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEW in the chair). The resolution will be stated.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 207), as follows:

Whereas it is reported in the public press that the Postmaster General of the United States offered to take over and operate, in behalf of the United States, the telephone system of the Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Co., within the District of Columbia: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate the proposition made by him to the Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Co., and also to transmit to the Senate any information which he may possess authorizing him to make such, or any, proposition looking to the taking over of and the operation by the Government of said telephone system.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, there is such a hysterical demand nowadays for the Government to take over and operate everything with which we have to do that we need not be surprised if it takes form calling for governmental ownership and control of telephones and affects the Post Office Department I have felt compelled, in view of the statements contained in the public press, to present the resolution and move its adoption.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

CONSIDERATION OF TREATIES IN OPEN SENATE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, some time ago I introduced a resolution asking the proper committee to report a change in the rules of the Senate with reference to the hearing upon treaties and the action of the Senate regarding treaties. At the time the resolution was introduced the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] made some objection, and in what I supposed was the interest of time I accepted the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire. The resolution as it was finally adopted called upon the committee to make a report upon this subject matter in order that we might have it before the Senate. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee if there seems to be any likelihood of an early report upon it?

Mr. OVERMAN. I must confess to the Senator that I did not know about the resolution. I called the committee together to consider all matters pending before it, and somehow this resolution was not brought before the committee at the time; but, if the Senator desires, I shall call the committee together again. It was my fault, I suppose; but I ordered my secretary to have everything brought before the committee, and I apologize to the Senator from Idaho for not having it considered by the committee.

Mr. BORAH. I have no desire to have an extra meeting of the committee, because all I want to know is that we are making progress and that a report will be made in due time.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am sure of that.

Mr. BORAH. We have plenty of time to deal with it, in case we act in good faith in regard to it, before any treaties are likely to come before us. If the chairman is of the opinion that it will be acted upon at the next meeting of the committee, that will be satisfactory.

Mr. OVERMAN. I assure the Senator from Idaho that it will be acted upon. I shall call a meeting of the committee for that very purpose.

DISMISSAL OF CAPT. ARTHUR E. PERELESS.

Mr. McCUMBER. I gave notice last Thursday that on the close of the morning business to-day I would submit some remarks upon the Bolshevik doctrine in our labor unions and its effect upon our war preparations. The Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] desires to take a moment on a matter of personal privilege, and I assume that that is superior to any claim I may have at this time, and, with the permission of the Chair, I yield for that purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will recognize no one after the Senator from Montana concludes save the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. MYERS. I thank the Chair and the Senator from North Dakota. I desire to speak but a few minutes, but I can hardly confine my remarks to the limitation of a moment, as by the Senator from North Dakota indicated. I wish to speak for a few minutes on a matter of personal privilege; something in the nature of an explanation.

In the Washington Post of Saturday, the 23d instant, there appeared an article in regard to the action of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs in ordering Capt. Pereless to appear for examination before the committee and give his version as to why he was honorably dismissed from the Army. The article said in part:

The Pereless case goes to the root of the whole question in connection with the pending Senate inquiry—the ability of the committee charged by the Senate with this task to obtain the free and fearless opinions of witnesses summoned to the stand.

It has aroused the interest of Senators regardless of their party affiliations, and, judging by the present temper of the Senate, and the determination to investigate it thoroughly, it may become a cause celebre in the history of the war.

The decision to go to the bottom of the discharge of Capt. Pereless, ascertaining the reasons and the influences which promoted it, if any such suit exist, was reached yesterday at an executive session of the committee, with Senator HITCHCOCK presiding in the absence of Chairman CHAMBERLAIN.

Members of the committee felt that the dismissal of this officer one month after he had testified against the contract, which was canceled as a result of the investigation he had made in his official capacity, and against the protest of Charles Eisenman, vice chairman of the supply committee of the Council of National Defense, was an affront to the dignity of the United States Senate in view of the superficial evidence existing that it amounted virtually to the disciplining of an officer of the United States for testimony given by him at the command of the Senate.

The Senate is jealous of its prerogatives, of the immunity it gives to its witnesses, and of its surpassing dignity as the greatest deliberative body in the world.

It is regarded in some respects as one of the gravest issues ever raised between the legislative and executive branches of the Government.

At yesterday's meeting of the committee there was virtually a unanimity of opinion that the Senate could not afford to permit the incident to pass.

I have no criticism or condemnation for that article, Mr. President. It is not to that that I rise. There is, however, one statement in it about which I wish to make an explanation.

I cast no doubt upon the veracity of the newspaper writer or the accuracy of statement of the article, as far as the actions and attitude of the committee are concerned. However, I want to call attention to the closing statement which I have read. I have the honor to be a member of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, but I was not able to be at that committee meeting on Friday. I received the usual notice of the meeting; but it gave no indication of the nature or object of the meeting and I did not know what was going to be the subject matter of the meeting. I had no way of knowing, as far as any information that came to me was concerned. As I had other pressing demands upon my time for the same hour, very important matters of another nature to attend to at the same hour as the committee meeting, I was unable to attend the committee meeting. I will say, however, that is the only statement I wish to correct—and I have no grievance as to it, because it is a natural one, and doubtless the writer was sincere in it and was informed to that effect—the only statement that I wish to correct is the closing statement of what I read, that at Friday's meeting "there was virtually a unanimity of opinion that the Senate could not afford to permit the incident to pass."

The action of the committee may have been, and doubtless was, unanimous as to all those who were present, but I want to say emphatically that that unanimity does not include me. It was all right to make inquiry as to why Capt. Pereless was dismissed, but that was done by a member of the committee, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. He addressed a letter of inquiry on the subject to Gen. Goethals, the Acting Quartermaster General of the War Department, and he received a reply from Gen. Goethals, and that reply was published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and it was and is entirely satisfactory to me. I believe that Gen. Goethals is an upright, honorable, and truthful man, and when he says that Capt. Pereless was not dismissed on account of any testimony that he gave before the committee, that ends the matter with me. I am willing to accept his statement. I believe what Gen. Goethals says, and I have no disposition nor desire to go into an inquiry, an investigation, as to whether or not he is telling the truth.

So, while I was not able to be present, the statement that there is unanimity in the committee about the action of Friday is not correct. While I was not present, I am a member of the committee, and I emphatically dissent from what was done Friday. If I had been present, I would have opposed the action of the committee on the ground that it is unnecessary, and unnecessarily prolongs the investigation which the Senate Committee on Military Affairs is making.

Furthermore, I take this occasion to say that I not only dissent from that action of the committee, but that I dissent from very many of the things that the committee has done in the course of its investigation of the War Department. Of course, I admit the right of the majority to do as it will—that is, the right so far as the power of superior numbers gives it the right. I realize that the majority must rule, but I do question the justice of and the justification for much else that has been done in the course of the investigation by that committee as well as in the particular instance of its action on Friday.

I simply want to make it plain and emphatic that I am not in accord with the action of the committee that was taken on Friday. I do not consider that there has been any affront to the dignity of the committee or of the Senate or that there is any ground for a feeling of injured dignity on behalf of the committee or the Senate. If the War Department may not drop an officer from its rolls for what it considers good cause without offending the dignity of a committee of this body, then indeed I think the War Department is in a deplorable situation. I am not willing for the statement to go to the public nor to the Senate that the action of the committee on Friday was unanimous, so far as my assent is involved. I want it made perfectly plain and most emphatic that I dissent from the action of the committee on Friday, and had I been present I should have opposed it.

This is all I shall say about the matter at this time, but in the future I may take occasion to make better known and more emphatic my dissent from many of the things that have been done by the Military Committee in the course of the investigation it has been making of the affairs of the War Department. On many things I am not at all in accord with it.

EFFECT OF BOLSHEVIKI DOCTRINES IN LABOR UNIONS.

Mr. McCUMBER obtained the floor.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. McCUMBER. I will yield for a question, Mr. President.

Mr. GORE. I intended to state to the Senator the object for which I rose. I have several letters here from farmers in Oklahoma, Kansas, and California in relation to the wheat situation, and I was wondering whether or not the Senator would yield to me to have them read into the RECORD?

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish the Senator from Oklahoma would ask later to have them read.

Mr. GORE. I will not insist on my request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is in violation of the rule. A Senator holding the floor can not be interrupted for such a purpose.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, when the Czar of Russia was dethroned, an element known under the general name of "Bolsheviki" seized and assumed control of the government. I am informed that the word "Bolsheviki," while originally meaning majority, has, by reason of its adoption by the most radical element of that country, come to signify a creed which may be expressed in the words "more, still more, and always more." The combined soldiers and workmen's organizations, through whose ukase government was to be conducted and military campaigns operated, were the followers of this creed of illimitable avarice and impossible application.

The first act of these organizations in assuming the onerous duties of government was to shoot all their military officers and commanders. Their last act was to surrender Russian territory nearly as great in extent as the German Empire itself, and then demobilize the Russian Army, that no patriot might rekindle in their hearts the flame of loyalty and rally them to the defense of their fatherland.

Search the world's history through all its volumes vast, and nothing can be found to even approach this most damnable treachery to faithful and bleeding allies—this blackest treason to country and national honor. For this ignominious surrender under Bolsheviki reign let every Russian patriot for a thousand years wear branded on his cheek the blush of shame.

With this spectacle of national impotency and disgrace before us, and enlightened by the appalling conditions in our shipyards, is it not about time we were turning our attention to the Bolsheviki doctrine of those in our own country who are paralyzing the arms of the Government and imperiling the lives of our soldiers in France?

Mr. President, in the midst of a life and death struggle, when victory or defeat depends upon whether we shall or shall not produce the ships to meet the devastation of submarines and to support our armies, I find these same Bolsheviki sentiments expressed in an address before a convention of boiler makers by an officer high in the ranks of organized labor:

> Organized labor is a part, and a powerful part, a real part of the war in the United States. Nothing can take place, nothing can be done unless we are consulted and practically give our consent to it.

Mr. President, in the United States is this true? Is it a fact that this Government can do nothing without first consulting an element in the United States called the labor unions? Is it true that nothing can be done in carrying out great war measures without first securing the consent of this element of American society? I for one do not believe it. When, the other day, there was a carpenters' strike in the shipyards of the United States, the President of the United States, who all along has attempted to do justice, and more than justice, to the American workmen, finding that his patience had become exhausted, stated to those in authority that he would refuse to talk with them and that their duty was to go to work; they went to work. They did so because they well understood that their strike in that particular instance was unjust and that the American people would not stand back of them. And, Mr. President of the United States, the people of this country will back you in this and any other position you shall take to secure just service for just compensation.

Again, said this orator:

> We have organized boards, different commissions covering all phases of this war game, and in all these commissions and in all these boards organized labor has its representations.

I think that is true. He proceeded:

> You take the shipbuilding, and we are not talking about getting a penny an hour increase now. You remember when we used to strike to get 25 or 26 or 27 cents, an increase of a cent or two an hour. Now we are striking for dollars. We have forgot there is such a thing on the market as a penny any more. It is dollars we are talking about. Out on the Pacific coast, you know what is going on out there now. Seattle, Portland, San Francisco, all asking for dollars, $2 a day increase, $3 a day increase. It doesn't frighten anybody any more. Nobody gets boisterous about it any more. We are just coming together and going to get dollars now instead of pennies.

Again, he says:

That is only the beginning. We are now working on another plan to handle all the munition plants, outside of the shipbuilding, all of the munition factories where munitions of any kind are made for the Government, either direct or by contract or by subcontract. That commission will handle all that. That will be for the purpose of giving labor the benefit of the increased cost of living, which is climbing head over heels upward every day. And if flour jumps $2 to-morrow, and jumps again the next day, we will call the commission together and jump wages, keep jumping, getting more and more and more. I like that word "more." It sounds good to me. It is natural. It is human.

Mr. President, it sounds like Bolsheviki to me.

* * * * * * *

Now, I hope the boiler makers in convention here will get in their minds that beautiful thought of "more." Place your officers in a position to go out and demand and then back them up. Give them your united and undivided support. And in this crisis, instead of our organization being wiped out, instead of our power being lessened, we will come out after the war is over bigger and greater and grander and better understood than we ever were before.

Mr. President, that sounds like the Kaiser to me.

Mr. President, all autocrats and all autocracies speak the same language. Unlimited power is always unblushingly frank and brutally arrogant. The Kaiser and his pan-Germans say: The world belongs to those who have the power to take and govern it. They say we have the military power to crush our neighbors and seize their territory that we may extend our domains and dominate the world. We have attained our present greatness by the sword of conquest. Poland, Russia, Austria, Denmark, Holland, France has, each in its turn, surrendered its territory and been compelled to pay us tribute for having dared to attempt its defense. Our motto is "More territory, more power, still more and always more," until the world, lying prostrate at our feet, acknowledges our domination. Place your Kaiser in the position to make this demand and then back him up, and when we shall come victorious out of this war and impose our kultur on the world we shall be bigger, and greater, and grander and better understood than ever before. Mark the similarity.

Mr. President, neither of these autocracies recognizes the rights of other classes or other nations or any standard of equal justice, and, as the world can not submit to the domination of one nation over all the others, neither can this country afford to submit to the domination of any one class of people over all the other people.

Mr. President, we have seen the effect of Bolsheviki government in Russia. So, too, we have seen the effect of this Bolsheviki sentiment, "more, still more, always more," regardless of justice, regardless of patriotic duty, in the shameful delay in ship construction on which the very life of a great world principle depends. Drunken with power, swelled with importance, guided by no standard but that of more, and more, and still more, we are told that all munition plants, every line of industry upon which the life of the Government depends, will soon be reduced to the same condition of dependency and impotency as the shipbuilding program of to-day.

The time has arrived for the American people to accept this challenge and to answer the boast that any organization in time of desperate war needs can throttle our energies and destroy our power. We are a patient people. We wait for those in power to meet a situation. But when they fail, through cowardice or abject surrender to a great wrong, we find means to meet the situation. And, Mr. President, nine-tenths of the people of the United States are not going to have the country held up by the other one-tenth. This country is not Russia, and before we get through with those who are preaching the Bolsheviki doctrine in this country, before we allow this country to be disgraced and dishonored for all time, before we, like Russia, shall betray our allies and our cause, these nine-tenths of the American people will be heard from.

Mr. President, about last September, I think it was, when the I. W. W.'s were strolling through the State of North Dakota, at a time when we had a quarter or an eighth of a crop to harvest, and they were placing pieces of iron in the shocks and holding meetings to prevent the farmer from securing labor to take care of his crops, I received a communication fom an organization asking me if the Government would loan them 1,500 rifles and 5,000 rounds of ammunition, and they would take care of the I. W. W. element in the State of North Dakota. I had to inform them that the Government would not and could not do so, but that undoubtedly they could take care of the situation. Only a few days ago a Senator received from my State a circular calling upon people to report at a certain place the number of guns they had, the kind of guns, the caliber of those guns, and what ammunition they had for their use. The circular was signed "Vigilance Committee" or "Committee of Safety." What did it mean? It simply meant that in a threatening situation, when the Government is so weak that it can not protect its own citizens, there are always a sufficient number of naturally law-abiding men in this country who will take care of themselves just as the miners in the West, without government and without law, took care of the situation in forty-nine. So I repeat, the President need have no fear, the nine-tenths of the people will never allow the one-tenth or any element of that one-tenth to throttle this country. It is not necessary for us to surrender to anything that is wrong—and slacking anywhere is wrong.

While this Bolsheviki cancer, which is sapping our strength and jeopardizing our safety, is not confined to any one class, it nevertheless manifests itself in its most malignant form in supply profiteering and in labor profiteering in our shipyards. I wish to consider and condemn both. In supply profiteering I shall mention the case of but one shipyard. To get the general situation, you can multiply that one by the number of yards in the country.

Mr. President, Hog Island has added a new glory to its name. Everything connected with this shipyard, from the time of the purchase of the land on which it is located, down to the present day, has exemplified in the superlative degree the hog nature of man. The land, as I am informed, was assessed and paid taxes on a base value of about $100 per acre. It was sold to the Government for $2,000 an acre. And, finding what an easy mark the Government is, the owner is now bemoaning the fact that he did not ask $4,000 an acre for it.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator is not quite correct in stating that it was sold directly to the Government. It was sold to the International Shipbuilding Co., which rented it to the Government at the price of 6 per cent upon $2,000.

Mr. McCUMBER. I thank the Senator for the correction. It was rented to the Government on a basis of $2,000 per acre.

Mr. NELSON. Yes, sir. What I wanted to say to the Senator is that Mr. Black, who sold the land to this shipbuilding company for $2,000 an acre, had agreed to sell it the year before, and had an option outstanding, for $1,000 an acre. As a reward for his getting $2,000 an acre he has been taken out of civil life and is now a lieutenant colonel in the Ordnance Department of the Government.

Mr. McCUMBER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. It seems to me, under the facts stated, that that man ought to be court-martialed and dismissed from the Army.

Mr. McCUMBER. The testimony before the Committee on Commerce, as I remember it, showed that it was assessed for about $100 an acre.

Now, Mr. President, after this land had been purchased and the foundation laid on graft, it was but natural that the superstructure should be in harmony with that foundation; and so every act, every contract, every expenditure for material or labor has been madly, wildly extravagant. The hard-earned dollars of the industrious people of the country, exacted by the heaviest burden of taxation, have been burned in a wild Saturnalia of extravagance. To add to the cost, and thereby increase commissions and profits, the management thought it necessary to have a paper published at the plant. And so writers for the paper were paid from $500 to $833.33 a month to write paragraphs concerning this shipyard and to invite labor to that vicinity. Automobiles and trucks were hired at $25 to $30 per day for the machines alone.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. McCUMBER. Gladly, Mr. President.

Mr. NELSON. I will say that the shipbuilding company at Hog Island has three publicity agents, whose aggregate salaries are something like $2,400 or $2,500 per month, for carrying on a publicity bureau at Hog Island, paid by the Government.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; I will quote some of the evidence on that point.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Minnesota what are the objects and purposes of this publicity?

Mr. McCUMBER. I will cover that by the evidence in just a moment, if the Senator will allow me.

Mr. BORAH. I shall be very glad to hear it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Freight cars were allowed to pile up and remain unloaded until 1,300 cars stood for long periods of time without being unloaded while the country was freezing because cars could not be obtained to haul coal.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator may not have observed that in that connection it was also shown that there were 3,000 cars on the way that had to be held up.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; I thank the Senator for adding to that.

Contracts were made to pay double salaries for expert services. The cost of the construction, it is now conceded, will be three to four times the Government's original estimate. This single hold-up of the Government will probably cost it not less than $30,000,000. Just think of the supreme nonsense of spending the people's money to get out a little paper at this institution! I quote from the examination of Mr. Towle before the Committee on Commerce, and this will answer the question of the Senator from Idaho:

Senator VARDAMAN. I notice here that three men were employed as follows: R. N. Hunt, publicity assistant, $666.66 per month; D. T. Pierce, publicity manager, $833.33 per month; Thomas B. Reed, publicity assistant, $500 a month. These gentlemen I understand are the editors of this little paper. Did they really accomplish anything other than furnishing a pretty good story for some very excellent gentlemen?

Mr. TOWLE. The idea was to create interest in the job among the employees.

Mr. Towle testified that in the gathering of machinery, for instance, an ordinary crane that you should buy for from seven to eight thousand dollars cost the Government from twenty to twenty-five thousand dollars. When they needed lumber the lumber dealers immediately added 50 to 100 per cent to their selling price.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, may I make an inquiry for information?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. Were these salaries for publicity, and so forth, paid by the Government?

Mr. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; I understand they are.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield, Mr. President.

Mr. KING. I was told on Saturday that, notwithstanding these disclosures, the present person in charge, an admiral, is still perpetuating this publicity organization. Does the Senator know whether or not that is so?

Mr. McCUMBER. I am not informed as to whether it is continuing, but I had not heard that it was discontinued; and therefore I do not suppose that these gentlemen are throwing up these very lucrative jobs.

Mr. KING. Is the Senator a member of the committee?

Mr. McCUMBER. I am not a member of the committee.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. NELSON. I think Admiral Bowles went up there about two or three weeks ago to take charge and to reorganize the institution and put it on its feet. He is gradually weeding out the dead timber. He probably has not gotten around to this part of it yet; and I do not think he ought to be criticized because he has not done all the cleaning out that ought to be done there. It is a big stable to clean out, and he can not accomplish it all in a short space of time. I think if he is left in charge there he will undoubtedly take care of this matter.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. The private pay roll of the American International Corporation and the American International Shipbuilding Co. when the Government commandeered the yard were taken over by the Government, along with the visible property. The Government has had control for some time. The record will show, I think, that immediately upon the taking of the pay roll by the Government the compensations of many of the places then existing, if not all of them, were increased, and very materially increased. In addition to that some of the places to which the Senator from North Dakota alludes were created; but a part of this, at least, was during the latter part, while the Government was in control not only of the pay rolls but of the material delivered, the shipments made, the congestion of cars, and the yard.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. I think, with all due respect, that the Senator from Illinois is a little in error. This was an agency contract, and the matter was put under the control of this shipbuilding company; and it is only lately that the Government has intervened directly. While the Government has a right to take possession of the yard, to commandeer it, it has not done so absolutely. It has simply placed Admiral Bowles in charge of the yard; but it has not been taken over, as it might be, by the Government.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not want to take too much of the Senator's time. It is true that there is not an absolute ownership; but for a long time, beginning probably in September or October last, the Government has had agents and officers in the yard; and the pay roll will show in the case of Mr. Goodnow, who is the general superintendent, an increase of, I think, from $12,000 or $12,500 to $25,000 a year. That was after the Government assumed the pay roll and became responsible out of the Treasury for its payment. It is true, as the Senator from Minnesota says, that there was not an absolute ownership, but there was some Government supervision during that time.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, let me say that I can only strike the high places. I can only give the headings of chapters, upon which volumes might be written.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. As the name of Admiral Bowles has been mentioned—he having been designated, as I understand, to take charge of the situation there in behalf of the Government—I want to say that I have known Admiral Bowles for a great many years, and I shall be woefully disappointed if Admiral Bowles, honest man that he is, does not do everything in his power to remedy this evil which is so apparent.

Mr. McCUMBER. I certainly hope the Senator will not assume that I am criticizing Admiral Bowles in reading his own testimony criticizing the work that has been done there.

Mr. NORRIS and Mr. SHERMAN addressed the chair.

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I wish the Senator would explain, unless he intends to do so later, just how this corporation comes in. If there is an official of the Government there that has charge of it, why is there a corporation intervening, and who is it that composes this corporation?

Mr. McCUMBER. I would rather have that stated by some member of the Committee on Commerce, as that committee has been taking the evidence, and it is too long for me to deal with at this time.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POINDEXTER in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think we ought to especially pay attention to the remark of the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] that Admiral Bowles has only been up at Hog Island about three weeks, at the outside, and his designation for that work came as a result of these investigations that were had before the Committee on Commerce. I think we all have the very greatest confidence in Admiral Bowles, but the size of the task has been of such a character that he has not yet produced the needed results. I am confident that he will.

Mr. McCUMBER. Going back to this little paper, the wonderful effect of this little paper with its high-priced editors upon the labor is evidenced by the further testimony of Mr. Towle. Let me again quote:

Senator VARDAMAN. We have not seen very much manifestation of a patriotic desire to serve the Government either in price of material or for personal services.

Mr. TOWLE. Only on very rare occasions.

Senator CALDER. Mr. Towle, you said the labor cost is three times that of normal times?

Mr. TOWLE. Yes, sir.

Senator CALDER. Was that given to labor or was it because of waste of time?

Mr. TOWLE. The labor would eventually get all of that, but the amount of work performed by the labor was only one-third of what it would have been and should have been under right conditions.

Senator CALDER. In other words, the men were doing about one third of a day's work?

Mr. TOWLE. Yes.

Thus we have laborers being paid three times the ordinary wages and performing one-third of the ordinary service, so that each dollar paid out produced about one-ninth of what it would have produced under normal conditions.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. I just wanted to ask the Senator from North Dakota, if he would permit me, who Mr. Towle is. What is his relation to the Government or to the shipbuilding corporation? The Senator has introduced him as a witness here, but he did not state the capacity in which he was employed.

Mr. McCUMBER. He has been in charge of that yard, and he was sent there to investigate conditions by the Government itself.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Washington. He was not only sent there, but he was a civil engineer, generally supervising the work for the Government—looking after the agency, under Commander Reed.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; but, according to his own testimony, the work had begun there long before he was sent to supervise it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think that is true.

Mr. McCUMBER. And that is the question, as I understand it, asked by the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. JONES of Washington. He represented the Government.

Mr. McCUMBER. S. M. Felton, a War Department engineer, stated:

> I should estimate that possibly between 5 and 10 men out of every gang of 100 congregated about the plant were busy. I never saw such idleness in my life. Half the men we saw there, if properly organized, would have done more work than all the men we saw.

Think of it! With most excessive wages being paid, only 5 to 10 per cent of the men there were busy when he visited the plant.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It may be interesting to note that Mr. Felton, whom the Senator is quoting, is a practical business man and is the president of the Chicago Great Western Railroad. He is one of the men who volunteered their services and has been put in a responsible position in the War Office in connection with the transportation problems affecting that department. He went to study those problems, and in the course of his observations he found that condition.

Mr. McCUMBER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon me just a moment in that connection?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. I should like to add to the testimony as to the value of Mr. Felton's evidence by saying that I have known Mr. Felton ever since he came out of college, and that he has earned the reputation in the railroad world that if there is anything so disorganized or so badly gone that nobody else can do anything with it, they send for Felton.

Mr. McCUMBER. His evidence shows that he was more than shocked at the situation as he found it in the shipyards.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I will not interrupt the Senator further except to say that, quoting further from Mr. Felton, he regretted the construction there of superfluous tracks, and so forth, which he thought were entirely unnecessary.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. Joining with both Senators, the Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Pennsylvania, in their tribute to Col. Felton—whom, of course, I know personally, he being a constituent and a personal associate—I should like to ask the Senator whether the evidence does not make it clear that Col. Felton had nothing to do with these enterprises until after these wrongs were set afoot?

Mr. McCUMBER. Why, certainly, Mr. President.

Mr. LEWIS. He was seeking to correct them.

Mr. McCUMBER. He was there to investigate and correct them.

Mr. LEWIS. I thank the Senator. I wanted that clear, as I understood that to be the purpose.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, this Hog Island carnival of waste and extravagance is not an isolated case. Like conditions prevail throughout the country where speeding-up production has become necessary.

I found, on a visit to Camp Meade one Sunday last summer, about the same conditions. I rode down there at a time when all the laborers were performing their Sunday work. I saw one individual chopping a root off of a stump. Evidently he intended to chop it into a sort of kindling wood so that he could carry it away. A span of mules would have pulled the whole thing out of there in 10 or 15 minutes. He was chopping in a "Weary Willie" sort of a way upon a root that was about 3 inches in width and 6 inches deep. I passed through there and came back in three-quarters of an hour and he had cut that root nearly halfway off during that period of time. I looked around upon the other workers, and I found they were all working in the same leisurely way. And this was on Sunday, and they were drawing double pay for their work on Sunday!

I made a few inquiries about the situation in the construction of our cantonments, and I found that these men were not averse, on account of religious scruples, to working on Sunday, and therefore they were all present and they got twice as much wages on Sunday, but they laid off the next day and made Monday a holiday, so that they would work no longer than six days and get double pay for the holiday; and that character of service was followed in the construction of every one of our cantonments.

Mr. President, I want to read an article from the Post by a carpenter who was working here in Washington, I think, last October, and his letter was published in the Post. He says:

> Editor the Post: I have read the article in the Post last Sunday entitled "Four Men to One Man's Job on Government Work," and I want to say that I can verify this statement, as I am a carpenter now employed in this city. I was sent here a little more than a month ago from the Pittsburgh office of the George A. Fuller Co., and I am working on the building at Eighteenth and D Streets NW.
> The Hoover Building, as we call it now—
> I came here believing that there was a labor shortage, but I find that there is none.
> Not only have we four men for every day's work, but the job is overloaded with superintendents and foremen. I know of some two or three foremen who have but two or three men in their gangs and several who have no gangs at all under them, and these foremen are mostly incompetents, who do not attend to their work properly, with the result that it has to be done over several times.
> Mr. Hoover has been preaching economy, and yet on his building there has been expended $15 for every dollar's worth of work accomplished. I am signing my name to this and you can use it if you wish to.
> (Signed) WILLIAM A. YOUNG.

No one has attempted to deny this statement, that we are paying $15 where we should pay $1 in the cost of our cantonments.

Mr. President, I think we pay $40,000 to educate young men at either Annapolis or West Point. There are good engineers who graduate from these academies. Those engineers certainly understand how to build bridges. Those engineers certainly understand how to build a plain board and scantling shack, and that is all that is done in the building of these cantonments. Yet we have to hire men from all over the country to do the work that we have been paying $40,000 per head to educate men in the United States Army to do. Any one of the officers from West Point, I think, could have taken charge of a single one of these cantonments and produced ten times the results that we got out of the labor employed; and they were not all busy at that time.

Mr. LODGE. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. Did all these occurrences take place under the system of contracts on the basis of cost and commission?

Mr. McCUMBER. I think they did.

Mr. LODGE. The secret-contract system?

Mr. McCUMBER. I think so; and, of course, there was everything to encourage greater expense, because it meant greater commissions.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Is the Fuller Co., of which the Senator speaks, the same company now doing business for some department of the Government?

Mr. McCUMBER. I think it is the same. The same company has its plants in Philadelphia, I think, and in New York, Chicago, and in all the great cities.

Mr. KING. Why is that company and the Sterritt-Thompson Co. apparently favored in giving these contracts?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not know that. You must ask that question of the department. I do not even know that they are.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. The Senator has given some data in regard to the cost of labor under this system of building, the contract or fee system, as it is called. I wonder if the Senator has any data in reference to the cost of materials?

Mr. McCUMBER. Except that which I have read. I have very much more data, but the testimony here shows that for the lumber and the material, taking the Hog Island project, for instance, the charges were from 50 per cent to 100 per cent higher than had been previously charged others.

Mr. STERLING. I speak of that because in a communication made by the Secretary of War to the Committee on Military Affairs it was contended that the cost of material was even less for the building of these cantonments than in the ordinary market, that they were paying less.

Mr. McCUMBER. I cited the testimony of Mr. Towle that it was from 50 per cent to 100 per cent higher at this particular place, and that in the matter of cranes the Government had to pay from $20,000 to $25,000 for cranes that had been selling at from $7,000 to $8,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, this is a very interesting discussion, and I am optimistic enough to believe that it will result in great good, because those in authority can not by any possibility evade the responsibility, and they must look into this matter for the purpose of correcting it.

I believe there is inordinate and criminal waste of the Government money in many of these enterprises. A few days ago I was looking over the building that is being constructed, and I think is almost finished, running along Sixth Street back to the Fish Commission building, covering six or seven acres. One little incident came to my attention, and I would not mention it were it not that I have two witnesses to it who were riding with me in my motor car at the time. A load of boards was driven up. One man took a board from the wagon and six men conveyed it to a space where they were going to work on it. They were supposed to be carpenters. I understand that any man who can drive a nail or saw a board, whether he saws it straight or crooked, is a carpenter nowadays. They were getting a very high wage. That fell under my immediate observation, and, as I said, I had two witnesses to the transaction. Those men were not working, and it is a notorious fact that they are not working to-day. They believe they have the Government in their power, and they are going to do just as they please.

It is reasonable to suppose that if the men who are building ships, or pretending to build ships, and who are getting inordinate wages can carry that work along twice as long as it ought to be carried, they get their big wages, their big commissions, their big salaries for twice as long a time as they otherwise would.

I think it is a scandal, Mr. President, and I believe the discussion we are listening to now will have the effect of remedying many of the evils which exist at the present time.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, these facts that I have so far given are very unimportant and immaterial compared with what I intend to give before I get through.

Contracts of the most atrocious character, always against the Government, have been O. K.'d by Government officials. The Government pays every dollar of expense for raw materials, and yet pays individuals enormous profits. Men who never saw a shipyard, men who had no capital, have been given contracts to build ships, and they in turn have contracted to sublet those contracts to others, retaining big commissions. Banks have charged immense bonuses for securing contracts for their customers, and all this within the knowledge of, or easily obtainable by, Government officials.

So much for supply profiteering. Now, about labor profiteering. Mr. President, never before have we so needed ships. Never before has the cause of democracy, the cause of these very laborers, needed ships as they are needed to-day. The very life of that cause depends upon ship construction. Now, what is labor unionism doing to help that cause? Now, what is Mr. Gompers doing? We know what he is attempting to do—everything in his power to keep labor organizations loyal to the interests of the Government. But what is labor unionism doing in this battle? Mr. President, in our shipyards it is slacking in a most shameful and disgraceful manner. It is stated that there have been over 3,500 strikes in the shipbuilding industry and those industries connected therewith within a period of six months.

Mr. Frederick Lewis Allen, writing for the Outlook in the issue of February 20, 1918, is authority for the statement that up to Christmas there had been lost through strikes in the shipyards alone 596,992 working days, an equivalent of 30 days for 20,000 workmen, aside from the demoralization caused thereby.

Mr. President, those 20,000 workmen are just as essential and even more essential to the safety of this country and its success in this great war than any 20,000 soldiers we could land in France at this particular time.

Now, let us suppose that 20,000 soldiers with Bolshevik sentiments in their breasts should declare that the conditions or the situation was not to their taste and should refuse for 30 days, for a whole month, to obey the commands of their officers or do anything to carry out a military project. Is it not just as essential that these workmen should perform their duty, and must the Government stand idly by and allow them to refuse without any occasion, without any reason, to produce the very ammunition and the ships to carry that ammunition to protect our soldiers in foreign lands?

Notwithstanding the patriotic fervor of Mr. Gompers, notwithstanding the fact that the large majority of the membership of these unions may be loyal, notwithstanding his hostility to the I. W. W. doctrines, the fact remains that there are few union organizations to-day that have been able to eliminate from their ranks the I. W. W. element with its anarchistic sentiments, and that many of them seem to be ruled by that element.

I have a short clipping here on the shipping situation from the Scientific American of February 16, and I ask the Secretary to read it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

THE SHIPPING SITUATION.

In his summary last week of the first year of Germany's unrestricted submarine warfare, Sir Eric Geddes, First Lord of the Admiralty, said: "The submarine destruction still exceeds the production of ships, and in the meantime the demands for tonnage are increasing by leaps and bounds. * * * When we first asked the United States for ships there was a quick response. In no way can the United States help more than in building ships. Is she succeeding? Is she throwing her best brains and energies into it? I hope she is."

Is she? She is and she is not.

Congress has done its part by loyally granting every dollar of the vast sums which have been requested. Capital has done its part by the construction of enormous shipbuilding plants and by the enlargement of those which existed. The great industrial plants of the country have done their part by bending every effort to produce the huge quantity of materials needed for the construction of the ships. The press of the country has done its part by explaining the serious character of the shipping problem and urging upon the country the need for pushing it through with all possible expedition.

Nevertheless, in spite of this widespread combination of national effort, the shipbuilding scheme is threatened with failure because the most important factor of its success—the hearty, whole-souled and patriotic cooperation of labor—has failed to materialize.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think no one can deny the truth of that statement.

Mr. THOMAS. May I suggest to the Senator that I do not think Congress will have done its entire part until it enacts appropriate legislation, as Parliament has done, to meet this unfortunate situation, and at least restrict if not entirely prevent it?

Mr. McCUMBER. This whole discussion, Mr. President, is for that particular purpose.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the junior Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. HOLLIS. Will the Senator kindly repeat that last sentence, in which he says no one will dare deny?

Mr. McCUMBER. I say no one can deny the truth of that statement as to the conditions in the shipping yards.

Mr. HOLLIS. Will the Senator give me about two minutes in which to deny it?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; I can not allow the Senator to interject that at this time, because the Senator can not be unmindful of what has been going on in our shipping yards; and I will take the evidence of all of those who have given their testimony before the Committee on Commerce and the evidence that I shall present as against any one man's mere denial or statement.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I do deny it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, that denial does not change the truth.

Mr. HOLLIS. But the Senator will not permit me to say why I deny it and present argument on the other side.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator will have plenty of opportunity to deny it and to make any argument he sees fit.

In the January number of the Sunset Magazine is an article entitled "Bolshevikis of the West. What the Labor Unions of the Pacific Coast are Doing to Help Win the Great War." Every patriotic American ought to read that article. And after reading it and realizing the truth of it, the American people then ought to say, We will not submit longer to such a state of affairs. Copperheadism in whatever form it may exist ought to be stamped out.

From 20 to 25 ships are going to the bottom of the ocean every week, even during this time of lull, as it is called, in submarine offensive. There are ships on the western coast that are abandoned because the owners refused to compel their deck hands to join the union. There are ships awaiting boilers, and union labor will not put the boilers in because they were not constructed by union labor. What is the Government doing? Why does not the Government take those ships and see that they are completed and put into service, and put into service immediately? Are we so weak that we have no power to do this? I, for one, deny it.

If large forces of American soldiers are sent across the Atlantic and supplies fail for lack of tonnage, thousands of boys will sacrifice life and health in vain. If only a small force is sent, the duration and cost of the war in both life and treasure will be extended greatly.

It is stated that in the shipbuilding plants on the Pacific coast youngsters in their teens, with only a few months' training, are earning from $20 to $25 and $30 a week. Riveters have earned on piecework and overtime from $60 to $100 a week at the old rates before the Federal Adjustment Board had recommended an increase of more than 30 per cent.

Instead of working three shifts a day of eight hours, in order to turn out the necessary shipping, as we should, the shipyards of the West are working one shift of eight hours, plus overtime, and they are short handed even on this one shift.

It is stated in this article that on straight shell work almost any able-bodied, normal man can become a fair riveter with three months' practice. If the material is on hand, the speed of ship construction depends largely on the speed of the riveting gangs: that the average stint of an average riveter on straight shell work is about 400 rivets a day, and to exceed 500 rivets a day is not an unusual performance. Therefore, if we take 300 rivets per day, which is 25 per cent below the average, to constitute a day's work, we will be appalled by the inefficiency, or rather lack of patriotism, on the part of these riveters, or the unions which control them, to perform their duties even for the enormous sums that are being paid them. There is published in this article a table which is explained as follows, and which I shall ask to insert.

The first column designates the individual riveting gang, consisting of the riveter, the holder on, and the heater boy. The second column shows the number of rivets driven by each gang on a day early in October. The third column shows the amount of wages the gang received for the eight hours in which the members were "working." The fourth column shows the amount they would have received had they been paid by the piece at the accepted standard rate per rivet, which averages $4 per 100 rivets. Hold your breath and study this table carefully:

Gang.	Number of rivets.	Wages received	Wages earned (piece rate).
R-1	70	$11.10	$2.80
R-2	66	11.10	2.64
R-3	65	11.10	2.64
R-4	72	11.10	2.88

R-9	63	11.10	2.32
R-10	63	11.10	2.55
R-11	60	11.10	2.40
R-12	59	11.10	1.77
R-13	16	11.10	.72
R-14	44	11.10	1.79
R-15	52	11.10	2.60
R-16	50	11.10	1.12
R-17	55	11.10	2.20

R-20	45	11.10	2.28
R-21	50	11.10	2.00
R-22	23	11.10	.81
R-23	71	11.10	2.84
R-24	41	11.10	1.43
R-25	30	11.10	1.12
Total	1,277	277.50	50.74

It is asserted that if these 25 gangs had done a normal, fair day's work they would have driven 10,000 rivets, 400 per gang per day. Instead of that they averaged 51 rivets per day. Think of it! With this enormous increase in wages, these men, who could and should have driven 400 rivets per day, actually drove 51 per day.

As a rule, it would cost the Government not to exceed 4 cents per rivet. That would be $400 for 10,000 rivets. According to this table, it cost the Government not $400 but $2,175 per 10,000 rivets. In other words, these 25 gangs took $1,675 out of the $2,175 for which they rendered no service whatever. Presenting the matter in the form of percentages, the work actually performed was a little more than one-eighth of an honest day's work. Undoubtedly all of this is not due to the riveters alone, but to some extent to the lack of management or lack of organization.

Again, notwithstanding the fact that we were being sorely pressed for ships to partially meet the submarine destruction, all these laborers insisted upon a Saturday half holiday. It seemed to make no difference to them that the submarine did not lay off on that half day.

To show the petty annoyances and the enforcement of these union rules, I quote the following:

If a welder is needed to repair a boiler, he can not do the work himself. A union boilermaker must be hired to sit and watch the welder work with his oxyacetylene flame. By the same token, the steamfitters' union insists that a member be present, drawing pay and doing nothing except to discuss the war while the welder repairs a steam pipe.

To bring this matter into clear relief, I shall ask to read and insert into the RECORD the following excerpt from this article:

A heater boy decided that he needed a rest. Having arrived at this decision, he slipped away, picked out a warm place between two piles of lumber, and went to sleep for two hours. During his absence the riveter and the holder-on twiddled their thumbs, waiting for the red-hot rivets that did not come. The foreman was in a white rage. He demanded an explanation. The boy grinned.

"None of your damned business," he replied, impudently. "I got a right to stay away as long as I please."

The foreman fired him on the spot. Within an hour every heater boy in the plant had quit. A thousand riveters and helpers were idle. In two hours the culprit was back at work—and every heater boy puffed out his chest when the foreman passed.

This incident occurred early in November in one of the big shipyards of San Francisco Bay. It is an incident typical of the spirit in which Far Western union labor approaches the task of building ships for the Government. It is a most significant incident. With the facts to be hereafter recited it shows that discipline in the industrial army is rapidly disintegrating. It indicates that the same processes which turned Russia's military and manufacturing organizations into reckless, heedless mobs are likewise at work in the most important of the American arsenals—the shipyards.

Here is the companion piece of the heater boy episode:

In September all of the employees of a San Francisco factory struck in common with the metal trades. An assistant foreman, member of the machinists' union, noticed that there were scores of loaded cars in the factory yard. He knew that every freight car was needed to haul coal and war supplies; that perishable food materials were spoiling and factories shutting down because not enough cars could be had. As a patriotic duty he offered to unload those cars, but among the union men he found no helpers. He fired the small yard locomotive, hooked onto the cars, pushed them to the big electric traveling crane and single handed, working 14 to 18 hours a day, he unloaded and released for the Nation's use more than 40 freight cars. He also enabled the strikers to start work as soon as they returned.

In France he would have been given the croix de guerre for his devotion. In San Francisco he was cited to appear before a court composed of the officers and business agents of the machinists' union and accused of treason. When he asked them whether they placed the welfare of the union ahead of the country's need, they replied that his first duty was not to play the scab. Though he protested that he had done no machinist's work, he was found guilty, fined $50, assessed six months' dues, and forbidden to work in any union machine shop within 500 miles of San Francisco.

It sounds incredible, but every statement can be substantiated. And this is but one minor occurrence in a mass of facts that throw a glaring light upon the uses to which the war needs of the Nation are put by many of the Pacific coast unions and their leaders.

Mr. President, I ask here to insert, without reading, a couple of very brief excerpts from the March number of the same magazine, written by the same author.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The excerpts referred to are as follows:

In the car I found a seat alongside of an intelligent-looking chap.

"Working over in the yard?" I inquired innocently.

He ginned and nodded. "Been at it a year'n a half now, steady."

"Riveter?"

"Hell, no! I'm a carpenter, drawing down thirty-nine eighty a week, steady. Could get a lot more if I wanted to, but no overtime for this chicken. Eight hours, steady, is enough for any man."

"The work is pretty hard, isn't it?" I suggested.

"Not as hard, by a damn sight, as building houses," he replied. "In times like these it's me for the easy pickins."

"I suppose they drive the men pretty hard in the shipyards," I ventured.

"Drive 'em?" His tone suggested astonishment. "Say, if they wanted to get a day's work out of that bunch they'd have to have a foreman to watch every man, and then they couldn't do it. The only ones that ain't loafing are the riveters on piecework, the fellows that knock out eighty or a hundred a week, and they don't do all they can. Say, you go in a room on the inside of a hull almost any time, and like as not you'll see six or eight of the straight-time riveters sitting around counting their money or swapping yarns. If the straw boss hollers at 'em, they just pick up and quit. There's dozens of places that'll take 'em, and no questions asked. There's too much work nowadays for anybody to stand being hollered at."

* * * * * * * *

Yet nobody, not even the stingest employer, would begrudge these union mechanics these very high wages if the union workers would give an honest, full-day's work for a full-day's pay. They don't do it now. Here are a few more instances of what is going on:

A house carpenter went to work in the yards. He was given the job of putting up brackets to support the ceiling in a boat approaching completion. He put up three brackets the first morning. At noon the shop steward of the union came, looked in, and shook his head disapprovingly.

"Put up all those this morning?" he inquired.

"Well, three ain't so very much for half a day," apologized the carpenter, "but I'll do better when I get used to the work."

"Do better?" sneered the steward. "Say, if you put up another bracket to-day you'll get canned. Take a walk around, but don't forget that three is a day's work."

Mr. McCUMBER. How long can civilized society live under such conditions?

Mr. President, I made inquiry to ascertain the condition in some of the eastern shipyards from a source which I believed would give me most accurate information, and I received the following table and notations, which I here insert:

Some wages paid at one of America's largest shipbuilding plants, which at the time was running only at minimum capacity.

Workmen.	Hours working per week.	Wages per week.
Riveters:
A	50½	$57.21
B	55½	49.11
C	50½	52.11
D	62½	68.31
E	51½	57.51
F	67½	144.11
G	78	172.11
H	78	141.11
I	41½	86.31
Fitters:
A	46½	60.41
B	56	124.81

The labor report from which these figures are taken states that although the men are getting this liberal pay they are only 50 per cent efficient. In this yard 18,000 men have been hired during 1917 and only 11,000 have returned to work after working a few days.

Capt. Plisbury, of the United States Shipping Board, in charge of the work in the San Francisco district, testified that the output of the men in that district was 35 per cent and more below normal, and that while the average number of rivets driven by a riveting gang before present war conditions was 359 per day in the San Francisco yards, it now was only in the neighborhood of 150, and he attributed this in part to the labor unrest, the men moving about, working in one yard and then quitting, and going elsewhere, etc.

I did not understand from this statement whether these wages were paid to the gang or to the individual, and I wrote to get that definite information and received this reply:

With regard to your further inquiry in the matter of the reference given you—of wages given riveters in a certain shipyard—the wages paid in the taule noted are not the wages of the riveting gang, but the individual wages of the individual riveters and fitters. Mr. Burton Hendrick, who has made a study of the labor conditions in the shipbuilding yards for some time past, who cited this record, took this from the original pay-roll report sheet in a certain shipyard where he saw this, and the name of each workman was on the original, but in the transcript, for various reasons, these individuals are designated merely as "A, B, C, D," etc. These men averaged in pay, it is noted, about $90 a week each. There was a labor report made with these pay-roll figures, which stated that these men were only about 50 per cent efficient.

While the conditions in the shipyards of the Atlantic coast are not quite so deplorable, they are, nevertheless, a disgrace to this country. The New York Tribune of February 4 quotes a high official of one of the largest shipbuilding yards in the vicinity of Baltimore as stating that it is impossible to estimate the actual cost of ships under contract at this yard, as the major work done is by the piece. Riveters get anywhere from $2, $2.50, $6, $8, and as much as $12 a hundred for rivets, according to location; that in some instances by working time and a half and overtime the men have made as much as $35 a day, and it is not uncommon for one man to make as much as $100 a week.

This official goes on to say:

This has brought about a condition which makes the men difficult to control, and they readily tell the boss if there is any complaint raised that they will quit and go to work somewhere else. The result of this is that the men are working at 50 per cent efficiency. They work when they want to and lay off at any time, no matter how urgent the work may be.

Before the war, when there was keen competition, when the men depended on their weekly wage, they put forth their best efforts. Now, when the country is calling for the best that they can produce, there is an utter indifference, and they can not be relied upon.

Mr. President, I am unaware what portion of the men who are giving less than 50 per cent efficiency are American citizens. I have heard it stated that close to 65 per cent were born in foreign countries, and that very many can not even speak our language. I might find some little excuse for their indifference, but can not see how any American, or any person whose nation is in alliance with us in this great war, can square such conduct with any claim to patriotism. The only excuse I can find for this is that they have been misled by the doctrine promulgated by their leaders—the doctrine of more and more and always more—and feel that they are justified in taking advantage of their Government, even to the extent of fatally crippling its war endeavors.

Nor is the Government at all blameless in this matter. On the contrary, it has surrendered soul and conscience, in some instances, to unionized labor. I am informed that on the West coast the Government itself stepped in and forced yards to either close business or recognize labor unions with all their disastrous rules.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield, Mr. President.

Mr. GALLINGER. At that point I should like to ask the Senator from North Dakota if he can tell the Senate what proportion of the laborers of this country are in labor unions?

Mr. McCUMBER. About one-tenth, I am informed.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is precisely what I have been led to believe is the fact, that 90 per cent of the laboring men of the country are not in labor unions, and yet the situation seems to be dominated by the 10 per cent.

Mr. McCUMBER. It certainly is.

Not only this, but the contracts which are made with the shipbuilding concerns are so drawn as to invite the very practices I have enumerated. To illustrate: If the contract provides that a certain ship shall be constructed for $285,000, which will yield the contractor, say, a profit of $35,000, it will specify that the contractor shall pay not less than a certain price, which is set out in detail, for the several classes of labor employed, and certain specified prices for the material to be used, and that, if the expense is greater, the contractor shall still have his $35,000 above that added expense. So there is no incentive on the part of the contractor to keep down expenses. If he has been paying $4 a day to his laborers, and they have been satisfied with $4 a day, the walking delegate will say to these men, "Strike for $8 a day." He will then say to the contractor, "There is no use in your objecting to this because it does not cost you a cent additional," and the contractor, rather than have a strike, naturally accepts the proposition, and the Government instead of paying $285,000 for that ship will probably pay $350,000 or more.

Mr. President, just to show that this Bolsheviki spirit is not confined to shipyard employees, but affects the production of food as well, I wish to read a portion of a letter I received from a former resident of my State, on whose probity and conservatism one can well rely:

I think that at the next session of Congress it behooves every American citizen, and especially our Senators and Representatives, to make some provision for the carrying out of a civil government.

In the irrigated district of western Idaho, especially in the Payette Valley and Twin Falls Valley, hundreds and thousands of bushels of apples and potatoes have been destroyed through lack of help, principally, and opportunity to move them into districts where they would be used and were wanted.

Men were paid from $13 to $17 a day for picking potatoes and putting them in a sack. They were not satisfied with this, and struck for $20 to $24 a day. A great many of those potatoes and apples were frozen. Little girls, boys, and women demanded $6 to $8 a day for picking apples or potatoes. Grown men, picking a couple of days at $15 to $17 a day and board, would refuse to work over two days in a week. The rest of the time was spent in pool halls and other soft-drink loafing places—and the crop was allowed to be destroyed.

Some law or some arrangement will have to be made to conscript the loafer either to labor or to the trenches, and if another farmer boy is taken from the farm in the coming draft this country will suffer.

Ah, Mr. President! I know only too well the truth of that statement. I know the impossibility of getting any labor upon the farm that will do one-fourth of what a 16-year-old boy can perform on the farm, and he does not work eight hours a day, either. He does well if he gets through, in the busy season, with 16 hours a day.

Now, just how long the American people will submit to being robbed, first by the material man, then by the laborer, and then to having both robberies encouraged and acquiesced in by the Government, the Lord only knows.

As I have stated, I hardly expect that portion of our laborers who are not Americans, but foreigners, to be governed by the same patriotic motives that should control Americans. But I have a right to say to them: "If you come over here and receive the benefit of these American wages, $10 where you received $1 in your own country; if you are to receive from $5 to $10 a day, while our soldiers defend you and our country with their lives for $1 a day, you shall do an honest day's work; you shall not help our enemies by stealing time from the Government."

Every man who holds up the Government in this time of danger commits a crime, and every Government official who stands by, armed with the power to prevent such acts against the Government and allows them to continue, is a participant in that crime. Every official who signs such contract, every official who pays, is guilty of assisting in despoiling his own Government in this time of war, and the Congress of the United States which takes no step after the facts are established to stop this spoliation can not clear its skirts from blame.

Mr. President, we already have in our hands the power to obtain everything necessary for this war in the shape of materials for what such materials are actually worth. We do not have to be robbed in getting our materials. If the country is being robbed, it is the fault of the officials in charge and not because of lack of power to prevent it. If the Government needs material it has a right to take it, and if the owner will not accept a reasonable profit the Government can still take it, paying 75 per cent of the price offered and allow the courts to determine what additional should be paid. The labor question, however, presents an entirely different case, and the labor question is a hundredfold more important. Let us therefore see what remedy we can propose to meet that situation.

Mr. President, on the 21st day of January, 1918, I introduced and had referred to the Committee on Military Affairs a bill which would organize into a reserve army the manhood of this country to sustain and support our boys on the battle line. It provided for the registration of all male citizens over 18 and under 62 years of age not called into military service, and their organization into units at their homes. It required no drilling; no uniforming. It interfered with no employment or right to contract for labor. But it did subject the whole or any unit to the call of the Government to perform such service in transportation, ship construction, and war supplies as the Government might require. It contemplated most liberal wages and conditions of service, but also contemplated honest service in return.

Mr. President, this is not a bill to conscript laborers, but a bill to bring to the service of the Government the actual service of millions of men who have never been engaged in any gainful trade or occupation and to make efficient those who are so engaged, to the end that every man shall have the opportunity to serve his country in some way and the Government have the benefit of the just service of every man in these days of dire need. Enact a law of that kind and we would secure this service.

On January 16 of this year I charted the war situation in reference to the resources of the opposing forces in material and man power and the weakness of ourselves and our allies in shipping. The figures I gave and the conclusions therefrom are absolutely correct. I established the fact with mathematical accuracy that to supply even a million men and to supply the minimum demanded of our allies, to just maintain the present strength of our cause, we and our allies should construct or otherwise bring under our control 17,000,000 gross tones of shipping in 1918; that Great Britain could not supply more than 2,000,000 tons, leaving 15,000,00 tons as a minimum to be constructed by the United States. But I am answered that this can not be done.

Mr. President, it can be done, and I shall proceed to show how it can be done.

We have now in the United States about 105,000,000 people. We have the greatest steel and lumber resources and the greatest steel plants on earth, and they are scattered all over the country. Harness the energy of these 105,000,000 people to our vast resources and we can do any and everything required to make a mighty success of this war. It is simply a question of the proper application of the human energy to the problems that are before us. We have that energy, we have those resources upon which it can operate, and we have the intelligence to properly direct it. What, then, are we lacking? Courage. Courage to do the right thing and to do it right now.

Mr. President, as every thinking man knows, this is a battle between productive industries. The real struggle is being fought far behind the battle lines. Those lines are deadlocked, and they will remain deadlocked. Three and a half years of appalling slaughter have not perceptibly changed the western front. As the steady stream of brave men goes down to death a steady stream of living flows in to maintain the level. But the very life of the whole line is dependent upon the productivity of the great industrial world behind it. Clog or break the industrial wheels and the whole line collapses.

More and more it appears to be a question as to which group of belligerents shall be first industrially exhausted; and that depends upon which is best able to conserve and use to advantage every ounce of its productive energy. In this the central powers have an immense advantage over their adversaries:

First. In that autocracy can and does so dominate every avenue of business and so control all labor as to secure the maximum of energy of every man, woman, and child who is compelled to labor and labor to the limit of his or her capacity to support the government. When hundreds of thousands struck about 10 days ago in Berlin, an autocratic Government said: "Be back at your workshops Monday morning," and every man of them was back at the shops.

Second. In that the central powers have millions of prisoners, now slaves, working in every line of agricultural and other important industries that serve the national war ends.

Third. In that all civilians in conquered territory, male and female, capable of performing any labor or service, have been conscripted to produce that which is to destroy their own peoples.

Fourth. In that tributes to the last farthing have been levied upon the peoples of conquered territory—in Belgium nearly $500 per capita per annum—which vast sums go into the war chest of the central powers.

Fifth. In that all the mines of coal and iron and oil deposits in said conquered territory, without the investment of a dollar in capital, are being worked by prisoners and the products turned into missiles of death against their rightful owners.

Sixth. In that every product necessary to support the armies of the central powers is being produced just back of the lines—and that is a mighty important feature—while those products necessary to sustain the allied powers must be brought from all corners of the earth, across an ocean infested by the deadly submarine.

But, Mr. President, with the United States in this conflict, all these gigantic advantages can be overcome if we, a self-governing people, will consecrate our energies to a degree approximating that which an autocratic governed people yield at the command of a dictator.

Mr. President, we are now facing the supreme test of democracy. Can a self-governing people voluntarily impose upon itself that labor, that sacrifice, that subserviency to the necessities of war which an autocratic government can enforce by a mere word of command? If it can not, it is doomed. I have faith that it can and will answer every sacrifice if the way is clearly pointed out, if the necessity is clearly established, and if the Government will direct the course to be pursued.

And, Mr. President, upon that hypothesis I proceed to point out the way in which we can produce not 3,000,000 tons of shipping but 15,000,000 or 20,000,000 tons, fabricated all over the country, assembled and put together at our ports and set afloat in 1918.

Let this Government say to the American people: The time has arrived in which your Government needs every ounce of American energy in the field of production. This Government proposes to deal with its people in a spirit of most generous liberality. The compensation is and shall be worthy of the majesty of American labor, and in return for that labor must and shall be worthy of that generous liberality. But the Government must treat all alike; it must not impose the whole burdent upon those only who will voluntarily assume it.

Mr. President, when this Government proposed the draft system for raising an army, we heard Senators and others declare that it would produce a revolution. I had no such fear. That draft system was so just and so equitable that it appealed to the conscience, the sense of fairness of the American people, and they applauded it. Of course, it found some opposition after it became a law. But this, for the most part, could be traced to a disloyal element, which will always be found in any country.

So when I introduced this bill I found the same people informing me that an attempt to do such a thing would cause a revolution. Mr. President, there can not be a revolution against a just demand. This Government says to its people: We are in a desperate war. Our soldier boys are baring their breasts to the enemies' shells, are interposing their bodies and their lives between our people and the destruction of that freedom which every true man loves more than life. Their sacrifices, their heroisms demand, not that you sacrifice anything on your part, but only that you and every one of you who are here at home, shielded by their devotion, shall perform an honest day's labor in whatever field required, to support and sustain your patriotic brothers. We do not ask uncompensated service, but service paid a better and higher remuneration than was ever received by you before.

Do you mean to tell me that this country has fallen so low, that the men and women at home are so constitutionally lazy or disloyal, that they are not even willing to give honest service for this country and its great cause?

Mr. President, if I had such an opinion of the American people I would welcome a revolution, for, if we are that kind of a people, God knows we are not worth saving.

My proposition is not a labor-conscription measure. It is a conscription of the American manhood of the country, whether laborer, clerk, professional, or official.

Is there a Senator in this Chamber who would not be willing to labor six days in the week and eight hours a day for the next four years to support our soldiers in the trenches? I know many of you work 16 hours a day and dream of your labors the other eight hours. And do any of you imagine that the rank and file of our American people are less loyal than you are?

No, Mr. President, such a law would not only be the most important, the most effective measure that could be passed, but the very justice of it would drown the protests of the leaders of any organization who should attempt a mutiny against the war requirements of this country.

We have the human energy to win this war and win it quickly, but that energy needs mobilization. At present the greater percentage of it is being wasted or unused. On the whole, it is backed by patriotic impulses, but, unhappily, in many instances those natural impulses have been warped or misdirected by those who are not satisfied with securing justice, but who advocate taking advantage of the present situation and holding the country by the throat until it shall surrender to the most exorbitant demands.

As stated, we and our allies should put 17,000,000 additional gross tonnage of shipping afloat in 1918. If concrete ships can be utilized, we could quickly construct 10,000,000 tons, but as this character of ship has not been used for a sufficient length of time to demonstrate beyond any possibility that there may not yet be some undiscovered weakness in it, we will leave that out of the question in this discussion. I am satisfied that concrete ships will meet the demands, and we should proceed to build them on that assumption—our desperate situation justifies the chance.

But suppose we build only standardized ships. There are sufficient steel mills in the United States, if the production of parts is properly distributed, to make every bolt and plate, every engine and boiler necessary to construct 15,000,000 tons of shipping in 1918, and there are a sufficient number of riveters organized, if they will perform an honest day's work for an honest wage, to put together and set those ships afloat.

You say you are short of labor. I deny it most emphatically. What you lack is mobilization of the labor we have to draw upon and the ability to insist that a day's work by those pretending to labor shall be given for a just and liberal compensation on the part of the Government. There are millions of people in the United States who produce nothing, and millions of others who produce almost nothing and whose services could be enlisted in these days of national danger.

Few people realize what a large proportion of our American population are not engaged in any gainful occupations; in other words, what a large number there are who do not earn their own living.

The Census Bureau gives us the number of those who were not so engaged in 1910. From 1910 to 1916 our population increased about 10 per cent. Assuming that the proportion was about the same in 1916 as in 1910, I am able from the census tables to compute the number of men and women over 18 and under 62 years of age who were not engaged in any gainful occupations in 1916. This computation, and I know it will be more or less astounding, would show males over 18 and under 62 not employed in any gainful occupation, 6,539,652; females over 18 and under 62 years of age not employed in any gainful occupation, 24,963,878.

And so, Mr. President, without even reclaiming the lost efficiency of those now engaged in remunerative employment, we have in the United States 6,539,641 men between 18 and 62 years of age—slackers—who are doing practically nothing and living off of the rest of humanity. Soldiers die for these men. Is it asking too much of them that they at least go to work during the war and do something for their Government? There are 24,963,879 women between the ages of 18 and 62 years not engaged in any remunerative employment. Of course we can not apply the same rule to them that we apply to our male population. While they are not engaged in remunerative employment, most of them are engaged in their household duties, which are just as necessary. They are rearing the families, caring for the children who are to be the bulwark of strength in every conflict that shall darken our country in the future. And yet out of these nearly 25,000,000 there are a vast number whose services could be utilized in many occupations, thereby releasing men for the more arduous labors. All honor to the millions of women who are laboring in the services of the Red Cross and whose industrious fingers in every gathering, day and evening, in private and in public, in social gatherings, and even in the galleries of the Senate, are turning out clothing for our American soldiers. But even in their ranks is a mighty field of opportunity. I note, for instance, in many of our apartment houses in this city young girls are operating the elevators and attending to the doors. There are thousands of lines of light labor which could be performed by women that are now performed by strong men whose physical prowess could well be turned into channels of productivity.

We say we need 500,000 men to assist in shipbuilding. We probably would need that many to build the tonnage that I have spoken of. Where will you get them? Well, I will tell you where you can get a great many. I find in the United States there are:

Landscape gardeners	4,154
Greenhouse laborers	18,476
Male dressmakers and seamsters	1,740
Male clerks in stores	303,147

Mark this—

Male clerks in stores, 303,147.

Actors, possibly I should not include these, but in the dire necessity of the country the best actor in the world is the one who can produce for his country	17,935
Elevator tenders, nearly every place could be held by a woman	27,511
Laundry laborers	39,488
Footmen, gentlemen who sit on the box beside the driver and convey the ponderous weight of a lady's calling card to the porter standing at the door with a silver tray to receive it	13,750

They ought to be ashamed to be doing it, but if they are not they ought to be sent either out into the trenches or put to some honest labor—

Other men servants	112,366
Waiters in restaurants, etc	113,239
Making a total in 1910 of	651,806

just in those 10 avenues alone, and you can double it and treble it if necessary. This estimate has been obtained by adding 10 per cent to the 1910 census figures.

Mr. President, there has been much said of late about women usurping men's places in the industrial world. But I have heard nothing said about men usurping woman's places in the domestic world. Here we have more than 200,000 men serving as domestic servants and waiters, places a few years ago held almost exclusively by women, and properly so. To me a man is about as much out of his place waiting on a table as a woman would be cleaning a livery stable.

There, Mr. President, is your army—at present a not only useless, nonproductive army, but a very expensive, consuming army—an army producing no surplus but consuming what would otherwise be a great surplus, a heavy load of industrial slackers to be supported by those who do produce. They are not unpatriotic, but acting individually they can not change their environments or occupations. Organize them and they will become a mighty power in helping to win this war. We should begin that organization immediately that they may be ready when called upon. This is the solution of the problem of production.

Mr. President, it would be amusing were the situation less tragic, to note the awakening of those responsible for the conduct of this war to the ludicrous truth that while they have been preparing a large army for France they seem in the beginning to have just forgotten all about the necessity for ships to transport that army and to supply it.

We declared war 10 months ago and immediately began the construction of our army, and the great press of the country also began to discuss what terms of peace should be imposed upon the conquered enemy. It very naturally occurred to some, whose experience in the realities of life had taught them to build their bridges before crossing them, to inquire about the ships to transport and supply an army of from one to five million men; and as the departments made no mention of the matter of transportation as one of the necessary adjuncts of an American military campaign in Europe, but confined their disjointed efforts to raising and supplying the army, some of us sought to attract their attention to this element of preparedness by placing in concrete form the exact situation of the world's shipping at that time, the inroads that were being made by the submarines, the vast excess of tonnage lost over tonnage constructed, and the fact that unless we immediately found means to overcome or neutralize the destructiveness of the U-boat, we should be compelled to enter upon a shipbuilding program far beyond anything the world had ever dreamed of as being within the realm of possibility.

It was impossible to secure any consideration of our plea. We were called pessimists, our prophecies gloomy forebodings.

Mr. President, on January 30 of this year Secretary Baker said in substance: "We have available to be shipped to France 1,500,000 men if we had the transportation facilities." Think of it! One million five hundred thousand men ready to depart to-morrow for France. Can they depart?

He further said: "I am revealing no secret when I say that ships is the crux of our problem." That is your answer, Mr. President, to the charge of pessimism and gloomy forebodings.

But let me ask Secretary Baker this simple question: Why were those words not uttered by the War Department 10 months ago? You knew then just what tonnage you would need to transport and supply an army of from 500,000 to 1,500,000 men. You knew it would require 9,000,000 tons for 1,500,000 soldiers. You could easily have inquired as to where you were to look for this shipping. If you answer that this was no part of the duties of the Secretary of War, that a Shipping Board had been created for that purpose, and you were concerned only with the creating of an army, then it seems to me you have given an unanswerable argument in favor of a war board that would bring into accord all of the programs of war.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KNOX. Would the Senator mind explaining how he formulates the estimate that it requires 9,000,000 tons of shipping to transport 1,500,000 men?

Mr. McCUMBER. To transport and supply them thereafter.

Mr. KNOX. That is what I wanted to understand.

Mr. McCUMBER. While the British in their Boer war needed, I think, between 6 and 7 tons per man. Admiral Harris, I think is the one, gave testimony before the Committee on Commerce to the effect that it would require from 5 to 7 tons per man. I am not certain whether this estimate was made by Admiral Harris or Admiral Bowles. I think both testified on the subject.

Mr. KNOX. That includes the initial transportation and constant operation to keep them supplied?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes, sir; that was my understanding of it, and a number of others gave like expert testimony before the Committee on Commerce. I am not a member of the committee. There are, however, members of that committee who could give the names of those who gave the expert testimony. I can say also that in addition to this testimony almost every expert over the country has given about the same figures.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield, Mr. President.

Mr. KING. The tonnage which the Senator has given in answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Pennsylvania would also include munitions and guns and all sorts of war material which would be shipped.

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly, to supply the Army.

Mr. KING. Much of that consists of locomotives and railroad paraphernalia, sawmills, and so forth.

Mr. McCUMBER. Whatever is necessary to take care of our Army and supply it with food and munitions. I am really inclined to think it will take more unless we are able to deal with the submarine, as some think we can deal with it before next August.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, is it not fair to state in connection with the Senator's statement that a number of experts have placed the amount as low as four tons per man, including all the war material which will be essential to the maintenance of the Army?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; but I beg to state that those who have given that have made no allowance for destruction of ships or other marine casualties and unforeseen delays.

Mr. KING. Yes; that is true.

Mr. McCUMBER. They have made no allowance for it whatever, and I think it safe to say that 6 tons per man is a fair estimate.

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. What was the maximum estimate?

Mr. McCUMBER. From 5 to 7 tons per man. On the floor of the Senate you had been informed at the very beginning of this war what shipping would be required and what we were up against, but those declarations from the Senate floor could not catch the ear of the public like one coming from the Secretary of War, and nothing short of a miracle could have opened the ears or eyes of the Shipping Board. And so, when 10 months later the Secretary made this declaration, startling only to those who had not given the subject consideration before, the press of the country suddenly caught the alarm, and editorial pages, which 10 months ago were condemning as pessimistic every attempt to awaken the administration to the impending danger of our gross neglect of ship construction, are now sending the S O S signals throughout the land.

Now that we have awakened, now that we have an Army of 1,500,000 ready, now that neither we nor the world have the shipping to take that Army over and supply it, what are you going to do about it? Well, I will tell you one of two things you are going to do. You will either get right down to business and construct ships on a greater scale than you have ever contemplated or you will allow this war to be over before you get into it, and our President's 14 articles of peace conditions will be a less heeded scrap of paper than the Belgian treaty.

Now, Mr. President, there is nothing pessimistic about this at all. It is simply God's truth. Unless we stop our dillydallying, and stop now and get to work, nothing short of a debacle in the central powers akin to that of Russia can save our faces and those of our allies, and I am not looking for anything of that kind in the central powers.

We are about to call for our second draft contingent. What will we do with them? Keep them in cantonments one or two years? Our allies are calling for food. The United States, Canada, Argentina, and Australia combined have an overabundance of food products to answer their call, but there are no ships.

Australia has 300,000,000, I am informed from her last year's crop and will have nearly that much more this spring.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Of wheat?

Mr. McCUMBER. Of wheat; and there are more than 70,000,000 bushels of surplus in Argentine, as I am informed, and all this year's crop yet to be handled; but we have not the ships.

So, again I ask, What are we going to do about it? Camouflage our eyes, hide the truth from our own people? The country has finally aroused itself from its lethargy sufficiently to observe that our boat is in the rapids and headed for the cataract. Shall we continue to drift with a drunken stupor of optimism or shall we seize the oars and with the full power of our reserve energies save ourselves from a shameful war failure?

Mr. President, I believe in paying most liberal wages. I believe, strongly believe, that he whose labor produces the things that go into the homes and the lives of the American people should receive a wage that would enable him to enjoy equally with other laborers and workers of the United States in every line of human employment or avocation that which is produced by the efforts of all. That means not only an honest day's pay for a day's work, but it means also an honest day's work for an honest and just compensation.

Mr. President, if I were to declare in a single sentence my own personal conviction as to what constitutes a just compensation for labor or services, I should say, that with the present efficiency of mechanical power in every line of production the compensation should be such as would permit any person, with reasonable industry and frugality, to accumulate sufficient savings to enable him to lay aside the working tools of life at an age certainly not greater than 65, without fear of destitution to himself or those dependent upon him; but that compensation should apply to all services in whatever line, whether in the laying of bricks, in the agricultural field, in the accounting room, in the transportation of goods, in the telegraph, in the telephone, and in all lines of clerical service, due allowance, of course, being given to the necessity for preparation or the arduousness or danger of the vocation.

Whenever, by the edict of any organization, the law of supply and demand is suspended and the wage fixed by such edict is so much greater than the general level of earnings of these others as to make the price of necessary commodities beyond the fair means of the general public, such wage is per se unjust and extortionate. The farm laborer, the clerk, the millions working for very ordinary salaries, have rights equal in every respect to those of the carpenter or the riveter, and in the case of war the Nation has rights superior to any or all of them.

Mr. President, when you send men to France and then allow those who remain here at home to receive either enormous wages for labor which they do not perform or enormous profits on goods furnished, thereby delaying and hindering the Government in its effort to speed up construction, the death of every soldier by reason of this delay is chargeable not alone to the slackers and idlers, but to Members of Congress as well. Can not we appreciate the fact that we have a duty to perform to the American people who are paying taxes, and to the sons and brothers whom we have sent to the war, and that every day's delay in the performance of that duty is an industrial and a legislative crime?

This is not an appeal to any class of American citizens, but an appeal to the American manhood of all classes. Your country needs you. Enlist in your country's cause. You who are younger give to that country your physical strength. You who are older give to that country in whatever line you can serve her interest. We do not ask of you what we ask of our soldiers. We ask them to give their lives. We ask them to labor, not 8 hours a day but 24 hours a day if need be. From you we ask eight hours of honest labor, with no dangers surrounding you, and for that we are prepared to pay you exceptionally high wages. You are, therefore, not asked to yield anything, but rather to serve your country for most remunerative compensation. Is there a true American patriot in the United States who, understanding the situation, is so governed by his prejudices and so influenced by his leaders that he fails to comprehend the results of his inactivity? Can you not understand that holding back your service, failing to do an honest day's work, if it does not operate to defeat your country will at least continue the war for many, very many months longer, and the death toll due to those added months of slaughter will be chargeable to you who fail to support your country with the very best efforts that are in you?

Senators, recognizing as we must recognize that the compensation assured to every man who will render any kind of service in the field of production is not only most generous but in most instances almost fabulous; recognizing as we must recognize that, notwithstanding these more than liberal wages, in these hours of national danger, the labor performed, in the now most important fields of production, is only about 50 per cent normal or efficient, and in many instances not even 25 per cent normal; recognizing as we must recognize the lack of sufficient shipping to convey our soldiers to the battle's front or support them there, or to supply our allies with the food and war material necessary to sustain them during this war; recognizing as we must recognize that there are millions of able men in this country who are at present nonproducers; recognizing as we must recognize that this crisis can only be met by mobilizing the energies of all our people and consecrating those energies to the cause of production and transportation, are we not serving the interests of our enemies, are we not failing to support our allies, are we not jeopardizing the very lives of our soldiers who, with ardent hearts and patriotic souls, have braved the ocean's deadly zones and left their homes and all that was dear to uphold our honor in foreign lands; are we not betraying the very cause of world liberty and democracy in permitting the continuance of this most pitiful failure to respond to these earnest calls for action?

Mr. President, whatever may be the views of the administration, whatever may be the views of the several heads of departments or boards, whose previous inactivity has brought us to this crisis, however long the public may exercise its hopeful patience, its confidence that somehow and some time we shall see and correct our errors, and that our resources and our bigness will in some way bear down our great adversaries, notwithstanding all these views and these hopes, I assert with all the power within me that the time has arrived when we should call upon every American, whether patriotic or disloyal, to give his energies to the support of this Government; when we should insist that each and every man shall perform an honest day's labor for this most generous wage, to the end that the great cause of this country in the bloodiest battle the world has ever known, shall not be crippled in its purpose by any man or set of men who put selfish greed above national welfare; that this great cause shall not be hampered by industrial slackers; that our hope of victory shall not be shattered by commercial disloyalty, that the very institution of democracy for whose principles and for whose very existence this greatest battle of the ages is being waged shall be vindicated throughout all the world as worthy of all this mighty sacrifice of blood and treasure.

Mr. President, I ask to insert at the end of this address a portion of the letter which I have received upon the labor question. There are but few pages, but it deals with all this labor problem so succinctly and clearly that it is well worth reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Have you ever stopped to consider, after realizing that this war is nothing more nor less than an industrial balance, what the odds are against us in trying to balance the equation with our geographical handicap? While Germany gathers her raw material, works it, and delivers it on the battle line, all within a radius of a few miles, consider what we have to do to secure the same result. After producing our steel and fabricating it into munitions, etc., at Pittsburgh or some other similar point, we have to ship it a thousand miles to the seaport, while Germany ships hers a few miles to the battle line. This means that we have to maintain, with the use of much labor, extensive railroad systems and equipment, and that we have to mine and use a large quantity of coal for this first operation. Next, we have to build and maintain large terminals, docks, warehouses, trucks, lighters, and various equipment for handling and loading this material at our ports. We must unload it from the cars, transfer it to warehouses and docks, and then load it on ships.

But we must first, before we get this far, take the greater part of our labor and energy to build ships, and to do that we must expend a large part of our labor in mining and producing raw material and converting it into the finished product. After building the ships and making all the tremendous machinery necessary to operate them, we have to mine, load, transfer, and unload vast quantities of fuel to drive these ships, and in that one operation we have to produce and maintain further great transportation investments of labor and material.

After we have thus transferred the products of our labor across the ocean, we must provide great docks, terminals, and warehouses, unloading and handling equipment for the reception of these products of warfare, and we must again handle all this material, unloading it from ships. We must then manufacture, produce, and similarly deliver it in France, after three to four handlings of labor, all the railroad equipment and rolling stock necessary to remove the shipments from the ports of entry. We must then load them into cars with another expenditure of labor, and then, with a further expenditure of labor and fuel, transport the material across France to the scene of war activities.

Compare this with the one or two handlings of material produced by Germany, with her labor within almost gunshot of the seat of war, and you will realize that in this labor equation we must supply many times, maybe four or five times, the same amount of industrial effort to produce ultimately what Germany can do with the single effort.

This is all very much in point in relation to the labor situation. It explains quite fully why Germany has every present advantage in this war, because the industrial equation is all balanced in her favor.

The result is, and the great important point is, that the only way we can nullify Germany's great industrial advantage is to mobilize our industrial labor so much more effectively than does Germany that with the help of France and England we can overbalance the opposing side of the equation.

It must be realized that Germany with her long-perfected system of autocratic organization employs her labor and has mobilized it on the most effective and productive basis possible. It must be equally apparent that with our own industrial energy ineffectively mobilized and inefficiently productive there is utterly no chance in the world of our balancing or overbalancing this industrial equation, which, in other words, means the winning of the war. So far as labor is available the central powers in the present circumstances are at no distinct disadvantage, so far as natural resources and raw materials through which labor expresses itself are concerned in the ultimate production. The central powers have all the necessary resources to carry on the war. They hold the key to the steel and coal situation, which is the backbone of warfare. In population Germany, with her 70,000,000 people, and Austria, with her 50,000,000 people, combined with the population in the countries overrun of 42,000,000 people, the labor of which is drawn on without pay and without stint, give the central powers a population on which to draw of 162,000,000 people, all of which are geographically concentrated on interior lines.

Opposed to this we and our allies have our own population of 100,000,000 people, the English population of 40,000,000 people, and the French population of 38,000,000 people, and the Italian population of 35,000,000 people, or a total of 213,000,000. But the largest element of this, our own population of 100,000,000, being 3,000 miles away, is equivalent to but a fraction of its nominal amount and in its finality may be considered no more productive and effective in the field of warfare than a population of 30,000,000 people located as is Germany.

So far as available energy, therefore, is concerned, the advantage lies distinctly with the central powers, and so far as the raw materials necessary for the successful application of that energy in this great conflict are concerned the advantage again lies distinctly with the central powers, because the materials necessary for the allies must in large part be brought from a source three to four thousand miles away, with all the loss of energy which I have outlined.

This all comes right down to the fact that we never can hope to do anything in this war without the most skillful and efficient application of the industrial energy we possess. With the present attitude of labor and its attempt to take advantage of this situation to carry on its organization ambitions at such a time at the expense of production and of the country's success it is clear that we are hopelessly increasing our handicaps, which are most formidable under the most favorable conditions. It is absolutely a first essential, therefore, that we enforce the necessary regulations to properly organize our industrial energy and give it its maximum productivity. The logical thing to do is, of course, to conscript our industrial armies, regulate and discipline them the same as we do our fighting armies. It is clear to me, however, that labor occupies a position that will make the actual accomplishment of such a logical outcome improbable. The strength and influence of organized labor, in other words, I believe, as a practical proposition, is too great to hope for such a happy and effective solution of our internal organization.

There is absolutely no reason, political or otherwise, however, why we can not greatly improve conditions and pass a law which will prohibit strikes in any case during the period of the war, and determine all matters of dispute by arbitration. The Canadians have successfully applied this most reasonable statute on their books, and I think we should at least secure this much efficiency in our industrial organization, so that we will not have a continued repetition throughout the year of the strikes which have already greatly demoralized our war efforts, particularly in the all-vital shipbuilding.

I do not believe in class favoritism or class distinction. Both employers and employees should be called upon in the Nation's hour of need to give their best. Whenever either side attempts to take advantage of such a situation for its own gain, it should be promptly disciplined or regulated. If employers attempted, in organized effort, to do what the labor organizations have attempted and will continue to attempt to do—a hampering of production—they would be brought up with a sharp turn, not only by the Government's own disciplinary measures, but by public opinion, and they would well deserve it. That organized labor should be permitted to exploit the situation for the purpose of carrying on its warfare against unorganized labor, and the establishment of closed shops, inflated wages, and reduced production is intolerable, and no influence which they may have possessed should be permitted to allow such conditions to continue. It is the avowed intention of organized labor to attempt, during this crucial war period, to increase its pressure in its effort to spread its organization, and secure closed shops—and all with impunity.

Whatever merits may be argued for such a system, the exploitation of the present situation to secure it, at the cost of a national loss, is nothing short of treason, and is worthy of only the severest punishment.

There should also be restrictive measures which would prevent the great loss of energy arising out of labor drifting back and forth, working a few days at one job, then quitting, loafing, and going to another job. The attempt to overcome this by bonus is a makeshift and a failure. This should be prevented by direct restrictive measures and regulations. Such regulations can be formulated and made a part of the Government's laws for supervision in these war industries, so that labor may be made to stick to its job and not cause this tremendous and continuous economic loss of repeated "turnover" and intermittent idleness. Labor would be the gainer, not the loser, under such regulations, and I would recommend for your consideration some suggestions in what you may have to propose that will deal as well with that source of lost energy.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, in the general indictment of this country and the people thereof that has just been delivered by the distinguished Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], my attention is attracted by his charge that the labor of the United States in this emergency is unpatriotic. He challenges anyone to deny that charge. I deny it most emphatically. I ought further to say that the Senator began by indicting the Government, the War Department, the Shipping Board, the capitalists, those who work, those who do not work, those who work in shops, those who work on the farms. With his natural gallantry, he exempts the women, and I thought that he was going, through a sense of pride, to exempt Members of Congress, but before he took his seat he indicted the Members of Congress—all of them.

Let the capitalists take care of themselves; I have no doubt they will. Let the farm laborers take care of themselves, as I know they will, and none will be so devoted to them by the next campaign as will the distinguished Senator from North Dakota; but I do wish to say a word about the specific case of union labor at Hog Island.

It is easy enough to get up and read from some magazine which is controlled by capital, that is dependent for its success upon the contributions from advertisers, that labor is but 50 per cent efficient; it is easy enough to read from newspapers, from some special article written by a reporter who must attract attention by his sensational statements in order to be retained in the employ of the paper, that labor is 50 per cent efficient; but, Mr. President, labor has not yet been heard from in regard to the Hog Island inquiry. It seems to me that the operations at Hog Island have been somewhat discouraging. We are called on, as the Senator from North Dakota calls on us here now, to build ships, and it is said, "Do not be so careful about what they cost, but build ships." The Shipping Board turned to the captains of industry of this country, Stone and Webster, Mr. Vanderlip—the list of names sounds like a meeting of the American Manufacturers' Association, in combination with the American Bankers' Association and a Republican convention. Those men were told to build ships and to build shipyards, and then the evidence comes in that they have been wasteful and extravagant about it. There are Senators now at Hog Island investigating that subject, and we shall get the truth from them; but when these capitalists are charged with extravagance it is attempted by them to lay it on organized labor and to say they are not driving as many rivets as they did before the war. My information is that laborers have been taken there and kept day after day without having a chance to work; that they have been taken there and set to work, and yet there is no place for them to live, except miles and miles away, so that it takes them hours to get to their work. How can a man drive rivets when he is traveling on street cars or walking back and forth to his work?

I am told that the rivets that have been furnished by the capitalists of this country are deficient; that they are not made of the proper material; that they can not be clinched. I am also told that the pneumatic power furnished for driving rivets has been insufficient, due to the lack of coal or due to cold weather.

I do not know but that the labor at Hog Island is deficient in some respects. That would not be surprising, for the best workmen are the men who are living in their own homes. They will not leave New Hampshire, they will not leave New York, and they will not leave Ohio to go to Hog Island to work when they are satisfied with their conditions at home. You get the floaters for that work; you get the men who are looking for a chance to improve their condition; who are looking for a small day's work for a large day's pay, perhaps. You will not get the best men there at first, though they may come later.

There will be impudent boys; there will be boys who will not work; you can not help that; but those isolated cases do not prove that the great bulk of American labor in this country is unpatriotic. If I believed that statement, I would favor making immediate peace with the Kaiser on the best terms I could get. We can not win this war unless American citizens generally and American workmen in particular are patriotic.

It is no way to make workmen satisfied and contented and efficient to call them names; to call them Bolsheviks; that is not the way to do it. There is a great labor problem in this country; there is a greater one in England; there is a great one in France; and the greatest one of all in Russia; but the way to solve that problem is by calm, dispassionate argument and debate and counsel with one another, and not by abusing labor and making ex parte statements against them.

Mr. SIMMONS obtained the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina permit me a word before he makes his motion?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, during the debate on the shipping problem I have remained silent for the purpose of saving time, although I have been tempted on several occasions to speak. I go back to 1904, when the Merchant Marine Commission traveled over this country and Europe collecting data in reference to the shipping question, particularly with reference to our merchant marine, upon which subject the commission made an elaborate report and submitted a carefully prepared report. Had that bill, which was presented to both Houses of Congress, been enacted into law, we would not have been in the plight in which we were when this war commenced.

Had the bill, which proposed the establishment of 10 lines of steamships traversing almost all the oceans of the world, become a law the cost to the Government would have been about $2,000,000 the first year, with a largely decreased cost for subsequent years, because of the increased tonnage taxes that the bill provided. It is safe to say that $15,000,000, covering a period of 10 years, would have given the country a fleet of steamships that would have been the marvel of the world and would have been of inestimable value to the country when we engaged in the present war. It should be remembered that it was pointed out by me at that time that if a great European war between the maritime nations of the world should result our transportation system would be entirely broken down, as the foreign vessels then carrying our goods would be called into the service of their respective governments, the very thing that has happened; but that proposition was defeated, and as a result we have in the last year appropriated nearly $1,000,000,000 for the building of ships of one kind or another, a considerable portion of them being of wood, the value of which has yet to be determined. We were then building ships at $45 per ton, while we are now paying about $175 or $180 per ton, and the cost to the Government and the people of the United States that has resulted as a consequence of the defeat of that legislation, which was recommended by the Merchant Marine Commission, is a sad commentary on the wisdom of the Congress of the United States.

But, Mr. President, that time is passed; that legislation which would have done so much for the country, which would have given us fast mail steamship lines to all parts of the world, with auxiliary ships to convoy our merchant ships and our battle fleet, was defeated, and we are now face to face with a proposition to build ships as best we can and at a cost which is almost beyond belief.

I have had little faith in the scheme to build wooden ships. I recall the fact that Daniel Marcy, a distinguished Democrat, of Portsmouth, N. H., representing at one time his district in the other House of Congress, when he built ships, built them out of live oak, and when they built ships in Bath, Me., they built them also out of live oak, but we are now building ships out of pine, and I am very much concerned as to what will be the result. Of one thing, however, I am sure, and that is that when this war closes, whether it be within one year or five years, we shall have a job lot of worthless ships on our hands that will have cost this country an enormous amount of money.

Now, what I want to say is this, that while I have no disposition to attack the Government—the administration of the War Department or the Navy Department or the President himself—in this matter, I do insist that if there is waste, if there is a lack of economy either on the part of labor or on the part of those who are taking these contracts, if contracts are being made upon a basis that is not wise, that wastes the money of the people of the United States, those contracts ought to be abrogated or a different system adopted by the Government.

I think, Mr. President, that what the Senator from North Dakota said to-day will have an effect to bring about just that result.

I do not unqualifiedly indorse all the Senator has said, because I do not know the facts, but I believe that he has presented an indictment against somebody—perhaps against a good many people—that will be given due weight by the President, by the War Department, by the Navy Department, and, more particularly, by the people of the United States, who, after all, have got to pay in taxes the enormous cost that is being fastened upon them as a result of the necessary legislation that we are enacting to carry on the war to a successful issue.

The unwisdom of what Congress did in the past in reference to shipbuilding is admitted by all, but that fact makes it all the more imperative that we should now hasten the work and prepare ourselves to do our part in the great conflict in which we are engaged.

I thank the Senator from North Carolina for giving me an opportunity to say these few words on a subject in which I am profoundly interested.

WAR FINANCE CORPORATION.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3714, commonly called the war finance bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3714) to provide further for the national security and defense and for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to provide credits for industries and enterprises in the United States necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Finance with amendments.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Hollis	Norris	Smoot
Borah	Johnson, S. Dak.	Overman	Stone
Calder	Jones, N. Mex.	Owen	Sutherland
Colt	Jones, Wash.	Page	Swanson
Culberson	Kendrick	Phelan	Thomas
Curtis	Kenyon	Poindexter	Tillman
Dillingham	Kirby	Pomerene	Townsend
France	Knox	Shafroth	Trammell
Frelinghuysen	Lewis	Sheppard	Underwood
Gallinger	McKellar	Sherman	Wadsworth
Gerry	Martin	Simmons	Warren
Gore	Myers	Smith, Ga.	Watson
Hale	Nelson	Smith, Mich.
Henderson	New	Smith, S. C.

Mr. STONE. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. REED] is absent from the city on committee or official business.

Mr. NELSON. I wish to announce that the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT], and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] are necessarily detained from the Chamber in connection with a hearing before a subcommittee on an important bill.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], caused by personal illness.

I also desire to announce that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] is detained on official business, and that the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] is necessarily absent.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce the absence of the junior Senator from California [Mr JOHNSON] on official business. I will ask that this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to state that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. NUGENT] are necessarily absent on official business connected with Indian matters.

Mr. KIRBY. I announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], who is detained from the Senate on account of sickness.

Mr. MYERS. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. WALSH] is still detained from the Senate by illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEW in the chair). Fifty-four Senators have responded to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. SIMMONS and Mr. PHELAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I am advised that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] has given notice of his purpose to speak. I am also advised that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] desires to submit some remarks to the Senate concerning another matter than this bill. Under the circumstances, and at the request of several Senators, I have concluded not to ask the Senate to proceed with the unfinished business this evening; but I give notice that on to-morrow, immediately after the routine morning business, I shall call up the unfinished business and ask the Senate to proceed with its consideration.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, in common with other Senators on this side, I was unable to hear the announcement of the Senator. We should like to know what the announcement was with reference to this bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. I stated that, in view of the fact that certain Senators desire to address themselves this afternoon to another subject than that contained in the bill, and, at the request of a number of Senators, I have decided not to ask the Senate to continue the consideration of the bill this afternoon; but in the morning, immediately after the routine morning business, I shall ask the Senate to proceed with its consideration.

LABOR AND THE WAR.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, at the time of the formation of the Council of National Defense, after the passage last April of the resolution declaring a state of war to exist, there was a substantial concurrence of opinion among the authorities representing both employers and employees on the council. There were present representatives of the unions, their responsible officers, those who are unquestionably patriotic and trying to give their best service and to induce their different locals to give of that service to the preparation for the task that faces the country. It was agreed that this should be the foundation:

That employers and employees in private industries should not attempt to take advantage of the existing abnormal conditions to change the standard which they were unable to change in normal conditions.

There was a wage commission provided for the settlement of differences that might arise out of each change in the cost of living as affecting rent, provisions, clothing, and the like. This agreement has been in constant operation since that time; the changes that have occurred from time to time have been met, and there is no occasion with conditions facing the country with this agreement——

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order that the Senate it out of order. We can not hear the Senator at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, it is the Senate's own business, I presume, what kind of order it preserves, and I thank the Senator from Idaho for reminding it of its own duty to preserve its parliamentary self-respect. So far as I am concerned, I will make myself heard if I want to, and if I do not I can talk without an audience in the Chamber. The galleries are always here, and, after all, most of us are talking to the galleries, anyhow. We are getting used to empty seats. I am perfectly oblivious to the order preserved or to anybody's being present except the reporters, to whom I can dictate, and who are very appreciative of anything that may be said. I hope this will be permitted to be stricken out of the RECORD when I come to revise my copy, Mr. President. It is an interpolation, but I appreciate the effort to preserve order.

I recur now to the point which I was attempting to make a while ago. The Bureau of Labor Statistics have made a report and used up a great deal of paper, which is valuable nowadays. From that report I find that in the month of September, 1917, there were 283 strikes and 7 lockouts, and that the total number of working days lost in the month of September was 1,031,443. Since September, 1917, the strikes have been just as frequent, or more so, and probably the reports from the bureau will show a greater loss of days' work because of strikes, and possibly some lockouts, than indicated in the month of September, 1917. This goes to show that the men who are at the head of the labor movement find it impossible to control the locals, or the individuals in the locals, in order to obtain from them full service. This is a condition. It is not because the heads of the labor unions are willing to have it so, but because they can not control them so as to obtain full service from the members of the different unions throughout the country.

I am particularly moved to add this to the remarks of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] because it will appeal to the persons who are striking. Ultimately, if the strikes continue, it must impair our ability to win. We can not lose a million workdays every month in the year—the average of September, 1917—and reach our full fighting strength in this country. I am not violating any confidence when I state that at least one very eminent authority in this country, in a hearing, said that the inability of the country to receive a full day's work, and the failure of the unions of the country to perform their duty in time of war, were slowly exhausting the resources of the United States for war purposes. I am moved to say this in the hope that here and there there may be some member of a union who will feel himself to some degree individually responsible for giving a fair day's work for a fair wage, and that he will postpone the settlement of his difficulties until peace shall have been concluded.

Coming from Amsterdam, under date of January 30, there is an extract from the German metal workers' paper. It shows that the great international strike in Germany came to an end, and the labor movement is richer by a very grievous experience. It shows, too, that the minister of the German Government in charge of this matter would not discuss the demands of the strikers when they were presented to him.

The strikers, through the heads of the workmen's committees, presented a series of demands, including a fair distribution of food, the introduction of the eight-hour day, suspension of martial law, grant of right of free assembly, the introduction of equal direct voting, peace without annexations or indemnities, permission to establish a labor journal, and nonpunishment of participants in the strike. The minister refused to discuss these demands. He stated that work would be resumed the next morning, Friday, or the matter would be referred to the military commander.

He added that the working people would suffer heavily if, against wiser counsels, they persisted in their strike. The delegate reported the result of this interview to the strikers. It was hardly to be expected, in view of the existing excitement, that a vote to resume work would be passed. All entreaties were in vain, and the strike was to be continued. A few hours after this fateful decision had been taken the orders of the military authorities were posted up in the streets of Berlin and in all the striking centers of the country. These required that work should be resumed on Friday morning, in default of which strict conditions of martial law would be introduced. I should like to have the workmen who are going out on strikes in this country keep this in mind when they are misled by those who tell them that they ought to take advantage of these conditions. The instigators of the general strike were the first to return to work, while the mass of the strikers gathered at their meeting places, where the authorities would allow no assembly to take place. Meanwhile a special military court had been set up, working day and night. The arrests and trials numbered more than 100, and terms of imprisonment up to 10 months were imposed. Workers between the ages of 17 and 48 who were subject to military service were brought under military control, and were ordered to perform certain work for which they would receive only military pay. Large numbers of working people gave up their membership in the local trade organizations, and the heads of families who struck were impressed into the military service, sent into military areas, put in the trenches, and paid military wages. This is the imposition of the rule of an autocratic form of government upon labor people. I wish every laboring man in this country, whether a member of a union or otherwise, would remember that we are fighting to preserve a form of government where such methods are not used either in peace or in war.

I think the remarks of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] are pertinent to-day. I have no answer to make to the comments of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS]. I am not unfriendly to organized labor, but I do wish organized labor, while this war is on, to take no advantage of the emergencies facing the Government, but to give loyal service, and wait until time of peace to settle controversies about the open and closed shop, the number of hours to be worked per day, and the conditions attending their time of service.

It is this, Mr. President, that I particularly desired to be added to the remarks of the Senator from North Dakota, showing the difference between an autocratic form of government in settling strikes and a democratic form of government. Those two forms of government are on trial, and if we can not get from the labor of the country and from our resources something equal to the wages or commensurate with the effort they put forth, the republican form of government can not seek to compete in the battle fields with an autocracy. We must approach at least fairly the despotic measure of military efficiency. We will not get it as the Kaiser is getting it out of his subjects, whether willing or unwilling, we will not hope to approach it closely, no people's government seems to do so; but we must approach it nearer than we are approaching it now or we can not hope to succeed in the struggle the larger part of which is yet to fall upon us in the future.

Mr. OWEN obtained the floor.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. OWEN. The Senator from California, I understand, wishes to proceed for a few minutes. I yield to him.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I listened to the speech of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] and expected an adequate reply to be made which would go out to the country at the same time; and whereas the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] made a reply, it was only to that part of the Senator's remarks which referred to American labor.

I think it unfortunate that the Senator from North Dakota should have selected this day, of all others, to bring up the matter of the Hog Island contract, because I, in common with many of my colleagues, desire to hear more fully from both sides the circumstances which have created a scandal. The Senate committee in charge of the investigation is absent at this moment at Hog Island for the purpose of determining the facts; and as the members of that committee are most familiar with the developments brought about by the investigation, of course they would have been best equipped to have given us accurate information at this time. But they are absent. I do not for a moment desire to create the impression that there is any objection from any quarter, so far as I know, to a full and free investigation of all matters affecting the executive branch of this Government. I may say for myself that I voted for the Weeks amendment, which intended to create a permanent committee of this body to check, so far as possible, the expenditures of the executive departments and to pour the light of publicity upon every act of the administration, in order to preserve pure the operations of every branch of the executive departments of this Government; because light and air are necessary in a democracy for maintaining such conditions, and no man seeking the best for the Government, without any respect whatever to party considerations, should dissent from the general principle of investigation.

Those who objected to the Weeks amendment, probably wiser than myself, said that the work of investigation could be done more properly and better by the standing committees of this body—the Military Affairs Committee, the Committee on Commerce—and I bowed to their superior judgment, because these committees have taken up vigorously the investigation of the affairs of the executive departments of this Government; and certainly no reflection can be made upon the executive departments of this Government, so far as concerns their willingness to reveal information and to lay before us and before the country the exact facts, so far as they possess them. I do not know that there has been any accusation to the contrary from any source, and I was astonished at the statement to-day of my friend and colleague from Montana [Mr. MYERS] that he was opposed to the action of the Military Affairs Committee, of which he is a member, in deciding to investigate the case of the dismissal of Capt. Pereless. I should think the learned Senator would have waited until the evidence was all in before he prejudged the case.

I am not willing to accept the unsupported testimony of any one man in a judicial investigation, in a matter which I regard as of the most serious importance—that witnesses called before committees of this body should be exposed either to censure or to dismissal. It having been ascertained that his testimony before committees of this body was the cause of his dismissal from the service, it should at once arrest the attention of Congress, in order that it may preserve the integrity of its proceedings and its independence as a coordinate branch of this Government.

So there is no apology to make for the administration, and I submit that in the matter of the Hog Island scandal the President of the United States, before any action was taken by the committee in the way of pursuing their investigation on the ground, which they have wisely done, ordered the Department of Justice not only to investigate but to prosecute should it find evidence of wrongdoing. There is that disposition in the White House, which we all applaud, not only to carry on the war efficiently but to carry it on as economically as possible. But war is not economical. War is wasteful. It has been said of war that it wipes the people from the face of the earth as though heaven had repented the making of man. It burdens the people with debt to pass down from one generation to another like the curse of original sin. Its evils can not be written, even in human blood; and in that view all discussion here seems trivial. We are in the presence of a great world tragedy, and we are not counting the cost, but appropriating in Congress billions of dollars, always solicitous, however, to see that the money is expended wisely and economically; but expending billions of dollars, whereas but yesterday economy, retrenchment, and reform were party shibboleths, now they are cast aside, because we are in the presence of a great danger affecting our very national existence, our rights, liberties, and institutions. It is well, in passing, to comment upon laxity of expenditures for the purpose of getting the greatest amount of good out of the money that we appropriate; but it is no time in any other spirit than that of constructive criticism to cavil and to doubt.

I have heard of the cost of cantonments. There are cantonments in my own State. I have seen them grow up as in the night, under efficient labor, well directed. I did not inquire what they cost; and yet I know from the Council of National Defense that their only purpose was to have the work done, in order to house the soldiers of the Republic before the winter came in to decimate their ranks by disease and exposure. In that spirit, work was given to the builders: "Go ahead. Build the cantonments. You shall receive for your superintendence a percentage of so much."

There was no attempt to put out the work at competitive bidding. They could not spare the time. The Nation demanded that its sons be housed properly. So the only purpose in the minds of these men was not to save money but to spend it, because by attempting to save it they would delay the construction a month or two months. Maj. Starrett, at the head of construction of the Council of National Defense, told me that he was well aware that there were slackers among the workers, and that they had employed secret-service men to detect the slackers, and they did detect slackers, and they dismissed them, hundreds of them, in the camps where the construction was going on, in the interest of wise administration and economy. They tried to check in their department, so far as cantonment construction was concerned, that wave of extravagance which has gone over the whole country.

Everything has gone up in price; and as to the laboring men of the country, they have, I suppose, in common with others, found this an opportunity for bettering their condition, so far as the receipt of increased pay is concerned, justified in part by the high cost of living, the cost of housing, and the cost of heating, the cost of food, of shoes, of clothes. Why, we have gone to the extent, sir, of even constructing houses for these men engaged in great public works, on account of the inadequacy of the habitations now existing; and where there was that extraordinary demand there was an extraordinary increase in rental value, even in the District of Columbia, where Senators and Members of Congress are ousted from their houses where they have not been protected by contract. It is universal. It does not apply alone to labor.

I remember a few years ago, when the Democratic Party was in the minority in this Chamber, that the "captains of industry," the "malefactors of great wealth," in the euphonious language of a great Republican leader, were profiteering during times of profound peace to a degree which excited resentment in the minds of those who worked by the sweat of their brow, who regarded men in high places as taking advantage of their superior position and trafficking with the Government. You recall those days. And now my friends on the other side of the aisle, representing the great Republican Party—I hesitate to introduce party matters on an occasion of this kind—seem to be of one mind in reproving the labor of this country for attempting, if you please, to put itself in the position enjoyed a few years ago by the employers of the country.

I do not know that one is entitled to more criticism than the other, but I am quite certain that these stories of profiteering, not only in the past but to-day, have been, by the force of their example, one of the causes which have led to economic unrest among the laboring men of this country. I say, I hesitate to speak in a partisan sense or to refer to the painful past. I am not very much of a partisan. I am with these gentlemen in every legitimate investigation which they may choose to make and the punishment of every malefactor without remorse; but I read an article in the morning Post to-day, and when I heard the learned Senators on the other side as I came into the Chamber discussing with much heat these grave affairs I reverted to the column on page 2 of the morning Post, which began:

Republican drive near. Fight to control Congress begins with Hays's arrival. Chairman due to-morrow. Announces that he is willing to work under the direction of Chairman Woods, of the Congressional committee. Leaders sure of victory. Could control House now.

So we are drifting away from patriotic thought to party considerations, and the opening cannon of the campaign is to be heard to-morrow; and as a preliminary barrage fire, I suppose, we have had this drive in the Chamber to-day, when these gentlemen gallantly went "over the top," having had some inspiration in this purpose of one of our great political parties of beginning a movement, I hope, for the edification and not the confusion of the American people. If they have merit in their cause; if this administration fails in its work or hesitates to punish those who have failed them, either treasonably or actuated by meaner motives of greed and of gain, I say, may they triumph! The country can survive with either political party in power; but I think it is an unfortunate time to indulge in destructive criticism. The administration has done its work—extraordinary and tremendous, in a few brief months—I think, with the approval of the American people; and where there has been laxity, where there has been scandal, I do not know any man more eager to stamp it out, and with enthusiasm, than President Woodrow Wilson.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from California will not do me the injustice to assume for a single moment that the remarks that I have just made were in furtherance of any political scheme of any character. To disabuse the mind of the Senator and to dissuade him from remarks or even thoughts of that kind, let me tell him now that if President Wilson will so conduct this war as to be able to secure a victory that will assure the adoption of his 14 articles of peace conditions he will have earned the right to be President of the United States just as many terms as he wants the office. As strong a Republican as I am in sentiment and in protection, I want the Senator from California to understand that I am with President Wilson in this war, and not a thought of politics shall enter my heart or soul that will in any way conflict or interfere with my patriotic duty to help President Wilson accomplish that which he declares must be accomplished in this war. If I have said a word from which the Senator would imagine that my criticism is against the labor of this country as such—the labor as a great institution of the United States—he has sadly misunderstood the purpose of my remarks. I want unionism to get rid of the I. W. W. traitors, wherever they may be found. They do not belong to any country or to any nation. They have no policies except the policy of destruction. They are the ones that are doing the slacking, or commanding it. We want to stand with Mr. Gompers in his attempt to bring all laborers into loyal cooperation in this country of ours. And if he can not do it, then we want to assist him with a law that will eliminate the Bolsheviki slackers from the ranks of unionism.

The Senator said in his opening remarks that this seemed to be the wrong day to utter these sentiments. He did not explain what he meant; but I assure the Senator that there is no day so sacred or so holy that it can be set aside as a day on which you shall not tell the honest truth to the American people. We want to be with the President, and the President will be earnestly backed by the American people if he will insist that the laborers who are working in the shipyards shall do an honest day's work for their more than liberal pay. The Congress is back of him, the people of the country are back of him, and he need have no fear.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I accept the Senator's statement. I have no further words to say.

FEDERAL RESERVE FOREIGN BANK.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, on February 20 I introduced a bill (S. 3928) proposing to amend the Federal reserve act, and to establish a Federal reserve foreign bank.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. OWEN. I yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Does the Senator propose to bring up the bill this afternoon?

Mr. OWEN. No; I do not. I am going to submit some remarks upon it, because I want to give the reasons justifying the passage of the measure when it has been properly considered by the committees. Congress rarely moves beyond accepted public sentiment, and this is a matter which I regard as of very great immediate urgency.

I will call attention, for instance, to what is transpiring just now in Great Britain. I found in the morning press this statement:

"Forty British banks, including some of the largest in the British Empire, and with oversea branches, organized an association of oversea banks for the purpose of furthering British oversea trade and for the extension of banking facilities. This institution will also furnish trade information to British merchants.

"The British Government has fully approved this plan and is rendering assistance and encouraging the organization of institutions which have for their purpose the extension of British trade."

There are several of these important international organizations being framed now in London. Also France is taking steps along the same line. Germany has its bank plans adequately organized now.

This bill which I have proposed contemplates a capital of $100,000,000 authorized with a paid-up capital of $20,000,000, the stocks to be at 5 per cent, nontaxable, and to be offered to banks of the United States and to the public, and if not subscribed to be taken by the Treasury of the United States.

It gives corporate power to these banking institutions, authorizes a directorship of nine men to be appointed by the President of the United States, and that these directors shall be merchants and not bankers in the same way that the government of the Bank of England is controlled by merchants and not by bankers, these directors to serve for a period of nine years, one being chosen annually. The functions of the bank, the powers of the bank, will be "to receive the deposits from American and foreign banks and bankers, from the United States or foreign governments, in current funds in lawful money, national bank notes, Federal reserve notes or checks, and drafts, payable upon presentation, and also for the collection of maturing notes and bills."

"The foreign bank may discount notes, drafts, and bills of exchange arising out of actual commercial transactions—that is, notes, drafts, and bills of exchange issued or drawn for agricultural, industrial, or commercial purposes, or the proceeds of which have been used or which are to be used for such purposes, the Federal Reserve Board to have the right to determine or define the character of the paper thus eligible for discount within the meaning of this act.

"The aggregate of such notes, drafts, and bills, bearing the signature or indorsement of any one borrower, whether a person, company, firm, or corporation, rediscounted for any one bank, shall at no time exceed 5 per cent of the net unimpaired capital and surplus of said foreign bank, but this restriction shall not apply to the discounting of bills of exchange drawn in good faith against actual existing values. The foreign bank may discount acceptances of the kinds permitted under the authority of this act."

It shall have power "to deal in gold and silver coin and bullion at home or abroad, to make loans thereon, exchange Federal reserve notes for gold, gold coin, or gold certificates, and to contract for loans of gold coin or bullion, giving therefor, when necessary, acceptable security, including the hypothecation of United States bonds or other securities which Federal reserve banks are authorized to hold";

"To buy and sell, at home or abroad, bonds and notes of the United States, bonds and notes of foreign governments, and bills, notes, revenue bonds, and warrants, with a maturity from date of purchase of not exceeding six months, issued in anticipation of the collection of taxes or in anticipation of the receipt of assured revenues by any State, county, district, political subdivision, or municipality in the continental United States, including irrigation, drainage, and reclamation districts, such purchases to be made in accordance with rules and regulations prescribed by the Federal Reserve Board;

"To purchase and to sell, with or without its indorsement, bills of exchange arising out of commercial transactions as hereinbefore defined;

"To establish from time to time, subject to review and determination of the Federal Reserve Board, rates of discount and exchange and commissions for the opening of credits at home or abroad, to be charged by the foreign bank for each class of paper, which shall be fixed with a view to accommodating commerce and business;

"To issue bank notes and receive Federal reserve notes upon like terms and conditions as now provided for the Federal reserve banks;

"To open credits at home and abroad for account of domestic and foreign banks or bankers, to facilitate exports and imports to and from the United States and exports and imports to and from one foreign country to another foreign country."

I pause to say, as from China to Russia, which would go through the United States, and which might be properly facilitated by the financial powers of the foreign bank which I have proposed.

Further powers of the bank, "upon the direction and under rules and regulations prescribed by the Federal Reserve Board to establish branches and agencies in foreign countries for the purpose of facilitating commerce with the United States.

"No bank, banker, corporation, or individual, other than the foreign bank, shall sell dollar balances at less than gold par except as payment for merchandise imported into the United States without the express authority of the Federal Reserve Board."

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLIS in the chair). Will the Senator from Oklahoma yield?

Mr. OWEN. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. The Federal reserve act authorized the different banking corporations to form branch banks abroad?

Mr. OWEN. Yes; it did.

Mr. POMERENE. Can the Senator state to what extent the banks have availed themselves of that power and privilege?

Mr. OWEN. Practically not at all. At first the Federal reserve law contemplated that they would do that voluntarily, but they did not voluntarily establish these foreign branches. Thereupon the Congress of the United States, at the instance of the Federal Reserve Board, passed an amendment authorizing the Federal Reserve Board to require them to do this; but the Federal Reserve Board seems not to have found it practicable for some reason to compel any of these banks to establish foreign branches.

Mr. POMERENE. They have established foreign branches in South America, have they not?

Mr. OWEN. No, sir.

Mr. POMERENE. The National City Bank?

Mr. OWEN. The National City Bank is not a Federal reserve bank. Some American national banks have established in the last three years several foreign branches. The National City, of New York, has established a branch at Buenos Aires, one at Rio Janeiro, and another bank or two in Brazil, one at Caracas, one in Colombia, one in Cuba, one at Panama, I am told, and perhaps several other branches. That, however, is a private bank, a member of the Federal Reserve System, and a very powerful institution, but still an institution run necessarily by the nature of its organization for profit.

Mr. POMERENE. It is given authority under this act to organize?

Mr. OWEN. Yes; that is quite true; but there is no publicly controlled bank with foreign branches all over the world charged with the duty of furnishing the member banks of the great Federal Reserve System with foreign exchange and with furnishing importers and exporters with the credit facilities and with the exchange facilities which are vital for the legitimate and urgently needed expansion of our import and export business.

Mr. President and Senators, with a trade balance in our favor of over $3,000,000,000 for 1917, and with the American dollar backed by the largest amount of gold in the world, and backed by the most active industrial life in the world, the American dollar is at a discount in the neutral countries of Europe of over 20 per cent, and even in South American countries is at a discount as high as 20 per cent.

The Secretary of State a few days ago, before the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives, found it necessary to point out in his testimony there the astonishing condition that the American dollar was at a discount practically all over the world when all the world is indebted to America. It ought to be at a premium under such trade conditions, and there is something radically wrong in our international management when that condition is permitted to exist. It can be corrected, as I shall presently show. We lost $100,000,000 last year by it; we lost more than that. We lost practically $200,000,000 in our international exchange with Europe.

I submit, without reading, a table showing the imports and exports for 1916 and 1917, amounting to $9,183,000,000 total of visible imports and exports, and showing a trade balance in favor of the United States of $3,378,000,000. (See Exhibit A.)

I pause to remark that the trade balances must always be clearly understood as signifying only that state of the census of shipment of commodities shown on bills of lading, and do not in fact measure the full amount of international exchanges of value, but only commodities shown upon the commodity manifest customhouse records.

Our trade balance with Spain, for example, for 1917 was $55,587,690, yet the Spanish peseta, instead of being exchangeable for our dollar at 19.30 cents, is selling for 24.30 cents, a flat loss of 5 cents out of 20 cents, or 25 per cent loss. In point of fact, the American dollar should be at 25 per cent premium in Spain, and not 25 per cent discount, so that our loss justified by the exchange balance of trade is twice as great as it appears. At all events, we certainly have a right to demand that our dollar, notwithstanding, should be at gold par in Spain.

There is a flat loss of 5 cents out of 20 cents every time an American merchant is compelled to buy a peseta with American gold or with American credit based on gold. In point of fact the American dollar should be at a 25 per cent premium in exchange, because they require $55,000,000 of American money in order to pay their debt to us. They need the dollars, if we are only dealing with our exchange with them, and it is not fair to us that we should be put in the attitude of being required to pay a premium on their money when they ought to pay a premium on ours, if the exchange of commodities between the two countries is to determine that matter.

The fact that the Spanish peseta, however, is at a premium of 25 per cent means, in round numbers, that instead of an American dollar buying 5 pesetas it buys 4. It means that our merchants who bought $36,000,000 worth of goods from Spain, which they paid for in pesetas, receive in Spanish commodities 25 per cent less than they would have received if our dollar was at gold par in Spain. It means that the Spanish merchants who bought $92,000,000 worth of goods from us get with their currency one American dollar for 4 pesetas, and with that dollar, bought with 4 pesetas, get a like advantage in buying American goods, notwithstanding the fact that these pesetas in Spain do not leave Spain. The Spanish currency in gold thus buys more and our gold currency buys less because of this unadjusted condition.

It means, as I understand it, that out of the transactions between Spain and the United States in 1917 of $125,000,000 we suffered a net loss amounting to a fourth of this sum, approximately $33,000,000. It is just as much taken out of the United States as if it had been taken out of the Treasury of the United States and transferred in gold and given to Spain. It is taken out from our merchants, from our consumers, from our producers, and given to the merchants and consumers of Spain.

The United States Government understands this difficulty and is trying to correct it just now by arranging with France to establish a French credit in Spain that will bring Spanish exchange to par, because Spain is an international creditor. Take it altogether she has shipped out more goods than she has shipped in. So she is entitled to an international credit trade balance, and that has to be offset either in commodities, gold, or credit. The United States Government understands this difficulty, as I said, and is trying to arrange it. Spain has been reluctant to do this because of the extraordinary trade advantage of a premium on her currency to her and the matter has been hung up by the Spanish authorities. Besides this, we were compelled to ship Spain $88,000,000 of gold to meet the debts of Great Britain and France to Spain, only to end, nevertheless, to our still unbalanced trade disadvantage, because Spain is still an international commodity creditor. The Spanish merchant takes 4 of his pesetas and buys an American gold credit dollar in London and with these dollars buys American commodities at a like discount, so the American exporter gets for his dollar a Spanish credit of but 4 pesetas when he should get 5 pesetas. He loses 1 peseta on every 4 pesetas, or 25 per cent loss. When the American importer wants to buy in Spain he takes his American gold dollar and, through London, gets 4 pesetas credit in Spain, suffering a like loss, which then falls on the American consumer in due course of trade.

Notwithstanding our furnishing $88,000,000 of gold to Spain, we still suffer the consequences of the credit trade balance of Spain internationally considered.

The British and the French, both through private sources and by privately owned banks, are correcting this trade disadvantage of the premium on Spanish money, as far as some of their own special merchants are concerned, by establishing private banking credits in Spain and branch banks in Spain, which they will maintain until this unjust premium on Spanish exchange disappears, thus avoiding the loss to certain favored merchants of France and England, which our merchants are compelled to endure by the failure of our officials and of our bankers to safeguard in like manner our merchants. We have so far failed in the adjustment above referred to of furnishing credits in Spain. The premium on the Spanish exchange can be removed in the following ways:

Either by shipments of gold to Spain to settle her international credit trade balances or by arranging national or individual credits in Spain to cover these international credit trade balances until the international credit trade balances are removed, or by shipments of commodities to Spain to overcome the international credit trade balances due Spain, or by forbidding arbitrage and having England and France settle their balances directly, as we would then do, and put our dollars at a premium.

The same thing is true in degree with Holland, Denmark, Norway, and Sweden. Our trade with Spain, including these countries, amounted in 1917 to $450,000,000, involving a loss in 1917 of approximately $100,000,000 instead of a gain of $100,000,000, to which we are entitled by our trade balances.

We have no orderly method to protect our American merchants and American producers and American consumers against these losses. Our international bankers are interested as bankers in selling exchange, but they are not charged with the responsibility of establishing the American dollar at a premium or at gold par. They are naturally content with their commissions, charges, and profits for exchanges, which, apart from interest, amount probably to at least $100,000,000 annually.

The United States, in order to establish the American dollar at gold par throughout the world and maintain the American dollar at gold par, must have a mechanism charged with the duty of safeguarding the American dollar as far as possible, such as I propose in the Federal reserve foreign bank.

For a half century the trade balances have steadily been in favor of the United States. We have a right to expect that this will continue, and that these trade balances will crystalize in the ownership by the people of the United States in securities and properties scattered throughout the world. This is what has made Great Britain the greatest financial power in the world. Great Britain has always had the wisdom to maintain the pound sterling at par. For this reason the pound sterling has become the standard measure of value throughout the entire world and has contributed largely toward making London the greatest commercial and financial center of the world.

The British Government buys London bills in New York and uses credits in New York in order to balance the deficit of an international trade-credit balance against her in order to keep the pound sterling at about par, so that a British merchant who handles the pound sterling as a measure of the transaction knows what he is talking about when he makes a contract, and the British Government finds it necessary to stabilize this measure of the British merchant's contracts. America has not had the wisdom to understand this, and I am now engaged in the business and the duty, as chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, of calling the attention of the country to this matter in the hope that the Congress of the United States will speedily correct it.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Through what agency does the British Government perform that function—through the Bank of England?

Mr. OWEN. Yes; through the Bank of England, which serves as the treasury of Great Britain; and the Bank of England is a bank whose directorship is controlled by merchants and not by the bankers.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I understand that no commercial banker is a member of the board of directors.

Mr. OWEN. No; he is not permitted to be, for a reason the United States ought never to lose account of—that that great bank has for its function the protection of the industry and commerce of Great Britain as a public institution. Although the stock is owned by private hands, that matters not at all. It is a public institution nevertheless, just as I propose here that this stock may be owned by private hands; but still it shall be governed by the United States Government. The trouble with the banker is that he always thinks in terms of interest, in terms of commission, and that is natural. That is not a criticism of the banker; that is his business. He is a merchant in credit and is not to be blamed that he thinks in terms of interest and commissions, and I must not be understood as meaning to criticize him at all.

I am only pointing out that he is not properly the custodian of the commerce of the United States; that is all; because he looks at it as a thing to serve his interest instead of looking at himself as purely to serve its interest. There is a difference in the point of view which is obvious.

I have prepared a bill, which I now submit (S. 3928[1]) amending the Federal reserve act so as to establish a Federal reserve foreign bank. The 12 Federal reserve banks have found a field of such enormous activity in the domestic banking life of the United States that they have not been situated for adequately handling foreign business, further than the acquisition of a very small part of available foreign bills. They have utterly failed to meet the services expected. The foreign bank proposed is intended to serve as a medium through which all the reserve banks may safely, conveniently, and economically transact foreign business, if they wish; may buy and sell foreign exchange, and thus accommodate all of the banks in the United States, doing business with the Federal reserve banks, and to give like accommodation even to those banks and bankers who are not members of the Reserve System, in order that our importers and exporters, wherever located, may have every facility of buying and selling foreign exchange and establishing credits here and abroad for the purpose of buying foreign commodities and of selling domestic commodities abroad. It is intended by this act to provide banking accommodations to all our merchants who are buying and selling goods abroad, and to enable them the better to accommodate their home and foreign customers.

It has been said that nearly all the importers and exporters are located in New York City or in the immediate vicinity. As a matter of fact, the lack of these facilities, the very thing of which the country most justly complains, has compelled importers and exporters from the Pacific States, the Rocky Mountain States, the Mississippi Valley, and the Southern States to keep agents in New York to transact their import and export banking business, and this at great expense to them, and, moreover, the expense is one which has no justification in sound reason. In fact this is a great disadvantage to the importers and exporters of all the United States except New York City, and against this the country justly protests. Moreover, it has a most injurious effect upon the commerce of the United States, because the lack of these facilities throughout the body of our country prevents the expansion of export and import business with the body of our country, and is a thing which is against the development and prosperity of the United States.

Moreover, it is against the greater expansion and the greater prosperity of New York City itself, which would be benefited if the full powers of the United States in the export and import business could be developed, and that to its highest capacity, for, be it clearly remembered, finance is the handmaid of commerce, not commerce of finance—financial power follows successful commerce and decays with decaying commerce.

It has been said that this foreign bank would compete with the few New York banks having foreign-exchange facilities. It seems to me I heard something of this kind when we were framing the Federal reserve act. Then these New York banks bitterly complained that establishing 12 reserve banks would deprive them of deposits, of prestige, and of money-making power. Their lack of vision, as seen in the result, is fully evident. They have gained deposits enormously; they have gained prestige; they have gained increased power, with expanding power of the United States and its banking system. Only a half dozen New York member banks handle foreign exchange, and all of them should have these facilities through the foreign bank I propose.

The Federal reserve foreign bank would offer them facilities for serving their customers more economically, more efficiently than their own facilities can now afford. They would avoid the expense of keeping large deposits abroad, the expense of keeping foreign offices any further than their specialty might require them, and they could use this bank as an economical means of transacting their own business and would be able to liquidate their foreign bills through this bank in a manner which they can not easily do now. It would expand their power. It is true, I think, that where they are charging unreasonable commissions, unfair profits, and imposing unjust exactions which hinder the commerce of America, they would be, in the course of time, dissuaded from these practices by having a standard of fair value operating side by side with them. It would not interfere with their legitimate business. It might abate to some extent practices which are injurious to American commerce, injurious to our national development, and indirectly injurious to them in so far as they may be disposed to kill the goose that lays the golden egg. Our American bankers have not sufficiently realized that banking grows with commerce. The power and dignity of London are based on the verity of this conception. It will be remembered that the Bank of England has its directorate composed exclusively of merchants and not of bankers. They do not permit bankers merely to be on this board of directors for the obvious reason that the banker, who thinks in terms of interest and commission and profits and exactions, is not happily constituted to determine the best methods of serving commerce. Many bankers fail to really understand commerce. When Secretary McAdoo introduced Lord Cunliffe, governor of the Bank of England, as a banker, Lord Cunliffe quickly corrected this and said no, he was a merchant.

This foreign bank would make mobile and liquid the foreign deposits of American banks and would attract from abroad very large deposits of foreign banks who would like to use the facilities of this Federal reserve foreign bank.

The powers given to the foreign bank are the same which have been given to the reserve banks, except that the foreign bank does not look to the reserve banks or to the member banks either for capital or for reserve deposits. The capital to be used by the foreign bank it is proposed to obtain by the issuance of 5 per cent cumulative nontaxable stock, giving to the United States the surplus earnings after a 50 per cent surplus is provided for the foreign bank. It is proposed that this bank shall begin with a paid-up capital stock of $20,000,000 and a present authorized capital of $100,000,000.

The resources of this bank will be further supplemented by deposits from banks transacting foreign-exchange business, in its international transactions, from the deposits of the United States, of foreign Governments, and of foreign bankers. The same safeguards are thrown around the foreign bank as have been found wise in the case of the Federal reserve banks, with the same powers of issuing notes and receiving Federal reserve notes. But the foreign bank is particularly charged with the duty of facilitating financial transactions involving imports and exports of our merchants, and it will be the duty of this bank, as far as possible, to promote the parity of the American dollar in other countries, which will itself be a very great aid for American commerce.

The establishment of a gold fund in Washington by the 12 Federal reserve banks for adjusting their balances with each other by bookkeeping entries instead of by actual transfer of gold has served a great public economy, and the same thing can be done with international exchanges by establishing a gold fund in the United States and abroad to serve a like function.

A very important proposal of this bill is the concluding paragraph, to wit: "No bank, banker, corporation, or individual, other than the foreign bank, shall sell dollar balances at less than gold par, except as payment for merchandise imported into the United States, without the express authority of the Federal Reserve Board." It is the intention of this provision to prevent the transfer of credits to the injury of the parity of the gold dollar.

I digress here to say that we may now make the American dollar at par in Spain by transferring credits to Spain. All in the world we need to do is to transfer a credit to Spain sufficient to cover the international trade balance or a credit to pay for our own imports from Spain. The moment that is done the premium on the peseta disappears, because in normal times there is no premium on the peseta; and if you establish a credit there to be paid at some future time in pesetas, when the peseta is at par you are obviating this 25 per cent premium now on the peseta. It is perfectly plain. A citizen can do that; a single bank can do that; the Federal reserve banks can do it; the United States can and ought to do that now in order to safeguard our merchants from loss, and not to safeguard alone the merchants from loss, but to safeguard the American consumer and the American producer from such losses.

A nation is composed of the sum of its parts; a nation consists of individual units. When the individual merchant, as one of the units of our commercial and financial life, suffers a severe loss he transmits it to the body of the people through the goods which he handles. If he buys the goods where the American dollar is worth only 75 cents on the dollar he passes the loss on to the consumer; or, vice versa, he passes it to the producer, if he is buying for shipment under such conditions.

The reason for this is that the present tremendous discount of 25 per cent on the American dollar in Spain has been brought about by the transfer of American credits through London and Paris to Spain and the refusal of Spain to adjust the international differences by like credit transfers. If Spain can do this to our injury and to her advantage, we should protect our dollar by the same principle, and it takes actions, not words.

The United States, Great Britain, and France are now urging Spain to agree to take French securities or French credits for the purpose of correcting this injurious discount on American, English, and French money, all of which are suffering from a like discount in Spain, due to Spain's refusal to adjust by transfer of international credits.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from Oklahoma has indicated that Great Britain has been able to protect herself, because of the Bank of England and her methods of doing business throughout the world, against the very conditions from which we are now suffering. If she has those facilities, why is she not at present able to protect herself against Spain?

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, what Great Britain does actually now, so far as Spain is concerned, is that private banking concerns in Great Britain have established branches in Spain and have established credits in Spain; and by establishing credits in Spain they have those credits represented in pesetas. They are carrying those pesetas as a credit and selling those pesetas now to favored British merchants in London, to the protection of those merchants who have the wit to see what the loss is, while they leave the current exchange at a discount in London for the "accommodation" of those who do not see. What I am trying to do is to make America see. I do not want this to continue, and that is why I am delivering this address now to the Senate in the hope of also persuading the people of the United States.

I have many letters from importers and exporters urging that the dollar be brought to gold par.

The present war binds the United States to Great Britain and France so closely that the United States dollar, the English pound sterling, and the French franc suffer in precisely the same way so long as we extend the American credits to our allies in excess of our actual net nominal balance of trade.

The nominal balance of trade is arrived at by ascertaining the difference in commodity shipments and the actual balance of trade is a very different thing. The actual balance of trade must be ascertained not merely by commodities but also by credit transfers, and into the determination of the actual balance of trade we must consider not only exchange of commodities and exchange of securities but many other factors, such as freight charges by Great Britain, for example, at $150 a ton for furnishing our supplies to them, but also the charges, commissions, and profits paid by us in foreign ports; the purchase by our troops in France of large local supplies; the traveling expenses of our citizens abroad, and many such items which are not registered in any census bureau; also the purchase of foreign properties by Americans, and also interest payments which the United States is required to pay on stocks and bonds held abroad; also the interest payments which are payable from foreign countries to the United States; also remittances by foreign residents in the United States abroad to their friends and relations and many such factors which are not within the power of anyone to give. But we know that when the demand for the American dollar ceases and the American dollar is not at par that then a condition has arisen from these various causes at which we are being injured in a very subtle and very practical way, which falls first upon both our importers and exporters, and, secondly, upon our consumers of imported products and upon our exported products, injuring America in its most vital parts. This I wish to correct. I demand its correction and appeal to our business men in America to hold up my hands in the effort to furnish them a mechanism through which these unjust discriminations against the American dollar shall absolutely cease.

When peace comes the United States will be charged with the duty of maintaining its dollar at par, whether Great Britain or France protect their money at par or not, but the United States and our allies should attend to this matter now, for it is injuring us all.

The bankers in the Scandinavian countries and in Spain do not feel safe in carrying large balances in the United States, notwithstanding the stability of our Government, because, since we permit a fluctuation in exchange, they do not know whether they will receive the same amount back when the time comes that they will want their funds at home, and for the same reason American bankers hesitate to place credits in these foreign countries because when they want their money back they may find that the differences in exchange are interrupting them and preventing them from receiving their funds back dollar for dollar. For that reason the lack of parity in the currencies of the various countries comprise a very serious obstruction to commerce and prevent the easy establishment of an international gold fund which would safeguard all countries from the expense of shipping gold back and forth 3,000 miles across the Atlantic.

Any person of sound reasoning faculty ought to be able to see this. Nevertheless those who are called expert in banking seem not to have had the vision to properly apprehend it.

Some of the New York bankers in foreign exchange advise me that the exchanges are now furnished to importers and exporters at such low rate that there is no profit in the business. Strangely enough the same gentlemen advised me that this foreign bank is highly undesirable because it will compete with them in this undesirable business.

My attention was called yesterday to an interesting transaction involving the purchase of commodities from Spain, involving in round numbers approximately $100,000, on which there was a charge of one-half of 1 per cent by a bank of Washington, D. C.; one-half of 1 per cent by the bank in Baltimore, Md.; one-half of 1 per cent by a bank of New York City; and one-half of 1 per cent by the bank in Barcelona, Spain, amounting to $2,000 charges outside of interest, without any risk whatever against commodity shipments insured at par and a transaction which would take probably 30 days to cover, thus imposing a tax on this 30-day accommodation of 2 per cent. I do not complain of these banks in the least. They are looking at it from the point of view of the banker and not from the point of view of merchants, but since the bank in Washington had no facilities to deal directly with the bank in Barcelona, they go through two other correspondents for sundry reasons. Evidently, if there were a Federal reserve foreign bank, a member bank could furnish its customers the accommodation more economically than by this crude, unscientific, and very expensive system. It is probably true that in some very large international transactions the rate might be very low, but taking it as a whole these rates are high, and, moreover, it not infrequently happens that the bankers take other advantages of those engaged in commerce to participate in their commercial profits with which the bankers have no proper connection, just as under the old system bank directors would negotiate accommodations through their banks and be paid privately for their valuable influence, a practice which the Federal reserve act found necessary to stop, because it was levying an unfair tribute upon American commerce. There are bankers engaged in foreign exchange who advise me that this foreign bank is highly desirable and that it will enable them to transact their foreign-exchange business more economically by having one Government-managed agency through which this business can be conveniently and economically handled.

I was astonished to be told a few days ago by gentlemen employed by the Government as experts that it was desirable to have the American dollar at a discount in the neutral countries of Europe, because, among other reasons, while it was against the interests of the American importer, it was beneficial in the same degree to the American exporter, because one was the opposite of the other. I have carefully analyzed this astonishing statement and I am of the opinion that there is no foundation whatever for any such suggestion; that the exact contrary is true. It injures the exporter as much as it does the importer.

The American commodity producer who has a thousand dollars' worth of commodity in America is entitled to buy a thousand dollars' worth of commodities in Spain on a par gold basis, but when he exchanges his commodities for American dollars, or exchanges his American dollars for Spanish pesetas, he gets 4,000 pesetas instead of 5,000 Spanish pesetas. He loses 1,000 Spanish pesetas in the exchange. He is entitled to receive 25 per cent more than he gets. An attempt has been made to confuse this proposition by saying that commodity prices in the United States have risen more than they have in Spain and in the neutral countries of Europe. This confusing suggestion would be better plead if it were a fact. It happens not to be a fact, however, and would have nothing to do with the case if it were a fact.

The point is that the American gold dollars will not buy on parity Spanish gold money. The fact is that the American gold dollar, because of international trade balances, arbitrage, gold embargo, and so forth, will buy only 75 per cent of Spanish gold money, regardless of commodities, and any attempt on the part of "experts" to cloud this issue with the suggestion that Spanish commodities have risen less than American commodities shows the poverty of argument of these gentlemen. They appeal to a statement of fact, which if true would be immaterial, and which is not shown to be true. Norway products rose on an average 110 per cent since the war; Sweden, 66 per cent; Denmark, 66 per cent; Netherlands, 54.8 per cent; Spanish commodities probably about 50 per cent. The average of staple commodities in the United States have not risen greater than this, although some specialties have done so where the allies urgently needed them.

The one unhappy fact appears to be that when the American producer, with his thousand dollars' worth of commodities, buys a thousand American gold dollars, he exchanges it for 75 per cent of Spanish gold money, and then with but 75 per cent of Spanish gold money he buys less of Spanish commodities than he would in normal times.

COMMERCE THE VITAL MATTER.

It is not a question, however, of merely accommodating foreign exchange banks, although this purpose will be served. The much more important matter is stabilizing foreign exchange as we have stabilized credits in the United States and lowered the interest rates in the United States by the Federal reserve banks. This bank ought to be controlled by merchants just as the Bank of England is controlled by those who are trained and specially skilled in commerce.

In a striking editorial by one of the greatest editors in the United States, Arthur Brisbane, of the Washington Times, of February 12, 1918, appears the following:

> In the seventeenth century, when Cromwell had power, he asked himself first of all: "What does England need?" He knew that a commercial nation needed men that understood commerce.

And he points out that the policy of England established at that time of inviting to England men who understood commerce had resulted in the tremendous commercial growth of England, while those countries which treated men who understood commerce with indifference and with neglect and even with persecution went into decay.

America needs men who understand commerce. This bank ought to be controlled by men who understand commerce and not by bankers. The mechanism of banking is understood perfectly well by those who understand commerce, but the banker, who is engaged in banking for the purpose of making commissions, of getting the highest interest rate he can, does not sympathetically deal with commerce as commerce.

Men who have this point of view should not be in unrestrained control of American commerce, of the business of American importers and exporters, of American manufacturers, of American producers, of the interests of American consumers.

It was the inability of bankers to perceive that the commerce and industrial interests of America were superior to their private acquisition of property that made necessary the Federal reserve act and which took out of their hands the power to fix credits in the United States, to make panics or squeeze credits from time to time in order that they might multiply their fortunes at the expense of the American people. They can still do that within degree, and they still do it within degree, beyond a shadow of a doubt. Any man who is familiar with Wall Street knows it perfectly well. The traders in stocks are very skillful in diagnosing the conditions when that situation arises, and those who are experts are enabled to play successfully on either the bull or the bear side, just as credits are being expanded or being contracted by those who measurably control the credit market in New York City. Under the Federal Reserve System, however, they can only now operate within a very restricted field.

It may be expected that gentlemen who take this view will oppose any activity of Government that will undertake to protect American foreign commerce. I shall desire these gentlemen to record their objections before the Committee on Banking and Currency in public, where their objections may be scrutinized with a microscope and answered by men engaged in importing and exporting in order that the truth may be made clear and that private interests shall no longer control the foreign commerce of the people of the United States. The United States Government should have as sympathetic an attitude toward foreign commerce as toward domestic commerce.

I call attention to an interesting editorial of Mr. Arthur Brisbane in the Washington Times of February 12, appealing for justice in this matter. [See Exhibit B.]

I submit an interesting editorial of the Journal of Commerce of February 11. [See Exhibit C.]

This very able editor of the Journal of Commerce points out that making foreign bills readily subject to rediscount would make such bills as liquid as domestic commercial paper. He points out that private banks sometimes hesitate to invest heavily in foreign bills because in case of a stringency they might not be readily saleable, while the foreign bank could immediately provide a ready market for such bills and when exchange was scarce, or when rates tended to advance, could ease the situation by selling exchange and so help in a most important way and lessen the injurious fluctuation of exchanges.

He points out the sound maxim that trade follows the loan, and that having a foreign bank properly organized for this service could be of substantial service to those engaged in expanding the foreign trade of the United States.

He points out very wisely that the prestige of Great Britain had been due to the fact that her foreign trade was established not only by efficient labor but by capital available in the right spot and at the right time and under the right conditions to facilitate foreign business and that this fact developed in Great Britain a large body of investors, accustomed to employing their capital in other countries; that their investments became the channels or outlet for the products of British industry just as the returns that came to them became the means of their financing other British imports and exports; that this accounts for the great world market in London. The same conditions are obviously essential to make New York City, and San Francisco, and Galveston, and Chicago world markets by affording them like facilities.

He calls attention to the last words of President McKinley, warning "against the illusion that we could possibly have a permanent one-sided trade." In the long run imports are paid for by exports and exports are paid for by imports. The nations can not discharge balances of trade merely in gold, for they would exhaust quickly the gold basis upon which their currency is founded. America must encourage imports and exports. America must establish reciprocal trade relations with other countries. America must furnish her importers and exporters with a mechanism by which to accomplish this. This is the purpose of the bill I submit.

Through this bank we can accomplish many important results: First, we can give better facilities to our importers and exporters, and thus serve our manufacturers and our producers in field, forest, and mine. Second, we can thus enormously increase our foreign trade by extending these facilities through suitable credits, for commerce follows credit. We can make the capital of our importers and exporters go much further by giving them these facilities.

We can make more useful and more available United States credits now in foreign banks.

We can make and keep the United States dollar at gold par throughout the world and thus make the dollar the medium of international exchange and clear not only our own import and export business in American centers, but we can cause business between Asia and Europe to be transacted as it should be, through intervening financial centers in America, clearing sales of China tea, for example, to Russia through New York. These facilities will make the United States the financial center of the world, because we have the most gigantic and highly perfected banking system on earth, with the largest available capital resources in the world. The resources of the reserve banks alone are over three billions, and the bank resources of the United States now have a visible supply exceeding thirty billions.

It will lead to banks all over the world carrying balances in this foreign bank for the purpose of getting its accommodation. It will bring balances from foreign governments to this bank. I desire to see this bill perfected so as to meet the requirements of American commerce.

Recently the United States Chamber of Commerce held a very important convention of American business men at Atlantic City, lasting four days, September 17 to 21, 1917. This organization represents 400,000 merchants, wholesalers, jobbers, manufacturers, and business men, and they unanimously adopted the following resolution:

"Whereas the foreign trade of the United States for the last fiscal year shows a balance in favor of this country of nearly $4,000,000,000; and

"Whereas loans to our allies greatly exceed our 'favorable balance of trade'; and

"Whereas the continuance of any set of conditions which tend to curtail imports, because imports represent the only form of cash payment which our entire foreign trade is yielding; and

"Whereas high foreign exchange premiums penalize imports and tend indirectly to increase the enormous inflationary debit balance which the Nation is rolling up against the future in the form of foreign loans; and

"Whereas the advances to our allies are now proving a boomerang, leading to the depreciation of the American dollar in foreign markets because of lack of governmental regulation; and

"Whereas all our allies are now taking every step necessary to protect their own currencies abroad; and

"Whereas the American dollar is now at a discount of from 3 to 20 per cent in neutral foreign countries: Be it

"Resolved, That the United States Government, through its proper departments, take whatever action may be necessary to keep at parity the American dollar in every country of the world."

I believe that the Congress and the President of the United States and the executive officers of the Government should respect this expression of public opinion, especially when it is founded on sound reasoning and good sense.

The President of the United States undoubtedly is in cordial sympathy with this desire of the business men of America to improve their facilities for doing international business, and I respectfully submit some of the expressions from addresses made by the President referring to this question and pointing out in advance who may be expected to oppose it, and why.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, it is quite important that the parity of our money should be maintained abroad in every country. Is the Senator going to follow what he has just been stating by suggestions as to the best way to do that?

Mr. OWEN. I have already made suggestions by which it may be done in four different ways.

Mr. STONE. Well, I was not present at the time.

Mr. OWEN. I will repeat them for the Senator. It is a very simple matter. It can be done by a transfer of commodities, by a transfer of gold, by a transfer of credits, or by the forbidding of arbitrage. The forbidding of arbitrage, I might explain, means that a debt of Spain to the United States can not be canceled through London; it must be canceled direct. It prevents the shifting of credits from one nation to another nation for the purpose of canceling credits between other nations; in other words, if we forbid arbitrage, then our commodity trade balance would put the American dollar at a premium in Spain, and the same thing is true with regard to all the neutral countries. Great Britain could not then borrow from us large amounts of money, pay her debts to Spain and other neutrals, and leave the American dollar at a discount while she safeguards her private merchants by private arrangements of credit transfers from London to Barcelona and to Madrid. That is what I am trying to call attention to.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HENDERSON. Do I understand the enactment of the bill which the Senator advocates would correct the evil of which the Senator is now speaking?

Mr. OWEN. No; it would provide a mechanism by which to prevent its recurrence.

Mr. HENDERSON. It would be another one of the means for curing the evil referred to by the Senator from Oklahoma in reply to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. OWEN. Yes; it would provide a mechanism by which the evil would not be permitted to recur in future and could, if passed, effect almost an immediate remedy.

Mr. HENDERSON. I merely refer to that because I do not think the Senator from Missouri quite caught the point the Senator from Oklahoma was making.

Mr. STONE. Not being a financier, or the son of one, I do not quite understand why, if England borrows money of the United States and gives her securities at par for our money at par, she would transfer that borrowed money to Madrid or Barcelona or any other place to pay debts at 75 cents on the dollar. How could she do that without very great loss?

Mr. OWEN. England, when she borrows money from the United States, immediately pays it out to her manufacturers——

Mr. STONE. Yes.

Mr. OWEN. And her manufacturers, having these credits transferred to London, can then transfer them to Spain to settle their debts to merchants in Spain; and when they do that they give Spain an international credit balance. The consequence is Spain does not need our dollars to pay her debts here, but she uses the dollars which she has obtained from the British merchant to pay her debts here and that leaves us with our dollars at a discount.

Mr. STONE. Well, what kind of dollars do they get from the British merchants to pay their balances?

Mr. OWEN. They get them in payment for commodities imported to London from Spain.

Mr. STONE. But are the dollars English dollars?

Mr. OWEN. No; they may be in the form of English money or American money—either one.

Mr. STONE. Or they may be an exchange of credits?

Mr. OWEN. They may be an exchange of credits. The dollar and the pound sterling are merely measures of value; that is all. When Great Britain borrows from us in dollars she converts them in pound sterling, which does not change the substance at all, but when she gets this money at London and transfers it to Spain she puts the dollar at a discount unless we protect it by a similar transfer of credits.

Mr. STONE. I presume that is perfectly clear, but I am still confused as to just how it can be done.

Mr. OWEN. It is not a difficult question if the Senator has had his attention directed to it at all. It at last comes down simply to this, that when Spain is an international creditor of commodities there is due to Spain either in French francs or in British pounds sterling or in American dollars a certain amount of gold in exchange for the commodities which she shipped in excess of those which she had imported.

Mr. STONE. And the money is to settle the balance?

Mr. OWEN. These funds are required to settle the balance. When Spain occupies the position of an international creditor, then our money and the money of foreign countries dealing with her will be at a discount, unless we forbid arbitrage; and in that case she can not deal with us as one of a number of international allies, but must deal with us simply and directly on her indebtedness to us.

Mr. STONE. How is it with the pound sterling or the franc?

Mr. OWEN. They are both at a discount in Spain.

Mr. STONE. On a par with our dollar?

Mr. OWEN. No; they are a little below our dollar.

Mr. STONE. They run along the same general line, I presume.

Mr. OWEN. Along similar lines; yes. The pound sterling is about 2 per cent less and the French franc about 10 per cent less, due largely to large paper issues.

Mr. STONE. That is rather arbitrary.

Mr. OWEN. No; it simply follows the laws of trade and the charges which bankers feel justified in placing upon the business going over their counters.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the Senator read a moment ago the preamble and resolutions adopted by the United States Chamber of Commerce. In the preamble they make a statement to the effect that our loans to our allies have proven a boomerang, and as a result of these loans the American dollar has been depreciated abroad. Does the Senator indorse that sentiment?

Mr. OWEN. I do not indorse the language. The term "boomerang" is not an apt description of what has occurred to us. Extending these credits beyond a point where we safeguard our own balance with Spain, for example, has resulted in our dollar going to a discount. It could have been adjusted with comparative ease by the United States placing a credit with Spain to protect them. It only happened so because we have not the necessary mechanism. It ought not to have happened; there ought not to be any reason why such a thing should occur or should be permitted to remain.

Mr. POMERENE. The difficulty I have is to understand the causal connection which the United States Chamber of Commerce says exists between our making loans to our allies and the depreciation of our dollar abroad.

Mr. OWEN. What they mean is this, that Spain shipped a great deal more of her commodities abroad than she imported of foreign commodities into Spain. The consequence was that the outside world shipped to Spain $88,000,000 in gold, and there was still a balance due Spain on the excess of commodities she exported over what she imported, so that the pound sterling depreciated, so did the French franc, and so did the American dollar.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, unless I misunderstand, while that may account in part for the depreciation of the American dollar in Spain, I fail to see the causal connection between that depreciation and our making loans to our allies.

Mr. OWEN. What they mean by it is this, that the money we loaned to our allies went into Spain and put into Spain a large amount of surplus gold, but still left her an international creditor. The consequence was the Spanish people did not need American dollars and put our dollar at a discount accordingly. That is what they mean by it.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, was the American dollar a gold dollar?

Mr. OWEN. Yes, sir; it was a gold dollar. There is, however, this to be considered in connection with international exchanges, that the gold dollar now, to be adjusted by shipment across the sea, has to run the danger of the submarine; and the rate of insurance upon shipping gold has been rather high, at times going up as high as 8 and 10 per cent when the country was more alarmed than it needed to be. Then, besides that, there is in Spain a discount of 3 per cent on American gold, which does not circulate there.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator, with reference to that 3 per cent discount on gold imports, if it makes any difference whether the gold comes directly from this country or not?

Mr. OWEN. Yes. American gold does not circulate. There is no discount against British or French gold.

There is no reason why we can not have an agreement with Great Britain and with France to maintain the French franc and the British pound sterling and the American dollar all at par. We can do it simply by an adjustment of credits. That is all that is required, and that is what I am urging now, not so much for the purpose of dealing with the present mischief as for the permanent dignity and honor and power of this Nation; that our dollars shall be at par all over the world, and shall be, therefore, a constant measure of value all over the world. When that occurs, then we may expect the dollar to be the standard of measure and we may expect New York to be the financial center of the world. Until we do protect the American dollar we shall have failed to take one of the important steps which it is necessary to take. Of course, to make New York City, which is our great shipping port, the world center, as we hope some time it will be, the only way to do that is by doing as England did in making London the financial center of the world. It is through our merchants sending American-made goods to the ends of the earth and bringing back foreign goods to our shores for use here. It is commerce that will make New York a great financial center and not finance that will accomplish it.

EXTRACTS FROM VARIOUS PUBLIC ADDRESSES BY PRESIDENT WILSON AT THE PLACES AND TIMES INDICATED.

The President said in his speech in Baltimore, Md., September 25, 1916:

"One of the most interesting circumstances of our business history is this: The banking laws of the United States—I mean the Federal banking laws—did not put the national banks in a position to do foreign exchange under favorable conditions, and it was actually true that private banks and sometimes branch banks drawn out of other countries, notably out of Canada, were established at our chief ports to do what American bankers ought to have done. It was as if America was not only unaccustomed to touching all the nerves of the world's business but was disinclined to touch them and had not prepared the instrumentality by which it might take part in the great commerce of the round globe." (Baltimore, Md., Sept. 25, 1916.)

"I have always believed, and I think you have always believed, that there is more business genius in the United States than anywhere else in the world; and yet America has apparently been afraid of touching too intimately the great processes of international exchange." (Detroit, Mich., July 10, 1916.)

"Men are colored and governed by their occupations and their surroundings and their habits. If I wanted to change the law radically I would not consult a lawyer. If I wanted to change business methods radically I would not consult a man who had made a conspicuous success by using the present methods that I wanted to change. Not because I would distrust these men but because I would know that they would not change their thinking overnight, that they would have to go through a long process of reacquaintance with the circumstances of the time, the new circumstances of the time, before they could be converted to my point of view." (Detroit, Mich., July 10, 1916.)

"I do not like to say it, but I have been impressed sometimes with the very marked difference between American business men whom I have talked with and foreign business men. I am not speaking of some of the men who stand highest in the management of American business. They seem to be veritable provincials, ignorant of the markets of the world, ignorant of the courses and routes of commerce, ignorant of the banking processes, even by which goods were exchanged." (New York, Sept. 4, 1914.)

"We have left it until very recently to foreign corporations to conduct the greater part of banking business in bills of exchange. We have seemed to hold off from handling the very machinery by which we are to serve the rest of the world by our commerce and our industry. And now, with the rest of the world impaired in its economic efficiency, it is necessary that we should put ourselves at the service of trade and finance in all parts of the world." (Extract from address delivered at St. Louis, Mo., Feb. 3, 1918.)

"America, of all countries in the world, has been timid; has not until the last two or three years provided itself with the fundamental instrumentalities for playing a large part in the trade of the world. America, which ought to have had the broadest vision of any nation, has raised up an extraordinary number of provincial thinkers, men who thought provincially about business, men who thought the United States was not ready to take her competitive part in the struggle for the peaceful conquest of the world. For anybody who reflects philosophically upon the history of this country that is the most amazing fact about it. But the time for provincial thinkers has gone by. We must play a great part in the world whether we choose or not." (Detroit, Mich., July 10, 1916.)

"Our banking laws must mobilize reserves, must not permit the concentration anywhere in a few hands of the monetary resources of the country or their use for speculative purposes in such volume as to hinder or impede or stand in the way of other more legitimate, more fruitful uses; and the control of the system of banking and of issue which our new laws are to set up must be public, not private; must be vested in the Government itself, so that the banks may be the instruments, not the masters, of business and of individual enterprise and initiative." (Joint session of two Houses of Congress, June 23, 1913.)

"I have found that I had a great deal more resistance when I tried to help business than when I tried to interfere with it. I have had a great deal more resistance of counsel, of special counsel, when I tried to alter the things that are established than when I tried to do anything else. We call ourselves a liberal nation, whereas, as a matter of fact, we are one of the most conservative nations in the world. If you want to make enemies, try to change something. You know why it is. To do things to-day exactly the way you did yesterday saves thinking. It does not cost you anything. You have acquired the habit; you know the routine; you do not have to plan anything; and it frightens you with a hint of exertion to learn that you will have to do it a different way to-morrow." (Detroit, Mich., July 10, 1916.)

"We have not been accustomed to the large world of international business, and we have got to get accustomed to it right away. All provincials have got to take a back seat. All men who are afraid of competition have got to take a back seat. All men who depend upon anything except their intelligence and their efficiency have got to take a back seat. It will be interesting to see the sifting process go on." (Detroit, Mich., July 10, 1916.)

"We must cooperate in the whole field of business, the Government with the merchant, the merchant with his employee, the whole body of producers with the whole body of consumers; to see that the right things are produced in the right volume and find the right purchasers at the right place, and that, realizing that nothing can be for the individual benefit which is not for the common benefit." (Baltimore, Md., Sept. 25, 1916.)

"Not until the recent legislation of Congress known as the Federal reserve act were the Federal banks of this country given the proper equipment through which they could assist American commerce, not only in our own country but in any part of the world where they chose to set up branch institutions. British banks had been serving British merchants all over the world, German banks had been serving German merchants all over the world, and no national bank of the United States had been serving American merchants anywhere in the world except in the United States." (Baltimore, Md., Sept. 25, 1916.)

"The national banks of the United States, until the recent currency act, were held back by the very terms of the law under which they operated from some of the most important international transactions. To my mind that is one of the most amazing facts of our commercial history. The Congress of the United States was not willing that the national banks should have a latchkey and go away from home. They were afraid they would not know how to get back under cover, and banks from other countries had to establish branches where American bankers were doing business to take care of some of the most important processes of international exchange. That is nothing less than amazing, but it is not necessary any longer. It never was necessary; it was only thought to be necessary by some eminently provincial statesmen. We are done with provincialism in the statesmanship of the United States, and we have got to have a view now and a horizon as wide as the world itself." (Detroit, Mich., July 10, 1916.)

"My fellow citizens, this is what I believe: If I understand the life of America, the central principle of it is this, that no small body of persons, no matter how influential, shall be trusted to determine the policy and development of America. You know what you want in your business. You want a fair field and no favor. You want to be given the same opportunity that other men have, not only to make known what you have to sell, but to sell it under as favorable conditions as anybody else; and the principle of the life of America is that she draws her vitality not from small bodies of men who may wish to assume the responsibility of guiding and controlling her, but from the great body of thinking and toiling and planning men, from whom she draws her energy and vitality as a Nation." (Philadelphia, Pa., June 29, 1916.)

"A literary friend of mine said that he used to believe in the maxim that 'everything comes to the man who waits,' but he discovered after awhile by practical experience that it needed an additional clause, 'provided he knows what he is waiting for.' Unless you know what you are looking for and have trained eyes to see it when it comes your way, it may pass you unnoticed. We are just beginning to do, systematically and scientifically, what we ought long ago to have done, to employ the Government of the United States to survey the world in order that American commerce might be guided." (Washington, D. C., Feb. 3, 1915.)

"Then came the currency reform. You remember with what resistance, with what criticism, with what systematic holding back, a large body of bankers in this country met the proposals of that reform; and you know how, immediately after its passage, they recognized its benefit and its beneficence, and how, ever since the passage of that reform, bankers throughout the United States have been congratulating themselves that it was possible to carry out this great reform upon sensible and solid lines." (Washington, D. C., June 26, 1914.)

"Bankers, as body of experts in a particular, very responsible business, hold, and hold very clearly, certain economic facts and industrial circumstances in mind, and possess a large and unusually interesting mass of specialized knowledge of which they are masters in an extraordinary degree. But I trust you will not think me impertinent if I say that they excuse themselves from knowing a great many things which it would manifestly be to their interest to know, and that they are oftentimes singularly ignorant, or, at any rate, singularly indifferent, about what I may call the social functions and the political functions of banking." (Denver, Colo., Sept. 30, 1908.)

"The trouble with some men is that they are slow in their minds. They do not see; they do not know the need, and they will not allow you to point it out to them. If we can once get in a position to deliver our own goods, then the goods that we have to deliver will be adjusted to the desires of those to whom we deliver them, and all the world will welcome America in the great field of commerce and manufacture." (Detroit, Mich., July 10, 1916.)

"Not until the recent legislation of Congress known as the Federal reserve act were the Federal banks of this country given the proper equipment through which they could assist American commerce, not only in our own country but in any part of the world where they chose to get up branch institutions. British banks had been serving British merchants all over the world, and no national bank of the United States had been serving American merchants anywhere in the world except in the United States." (Baltimore, Md., Sept. 25, 1916.)

Mr. Paul M. Warburg, in "Essays on Banking Reform in the United States," says:

"The only modern bills in our country are the so-called 'foreign-exchange' bills drawn on European banks and bankers, which are indorsed, and which always have a ready market. But what an anomalous position! Instead of having the credit of the entire country available in the shape of millions upon millions of modern paper which Europe might and would buy, we must rely on the willingness and the ability of a few banks and bankers to use their own credit by drawing their own long bills on Europe. This is a costly and most unscientific mode of procedure which is in no way adequate to the necessities of the situation."

And in his "Discount System in Europe" Mr. Warburg said:

"It is inconceivable that the United States, a Nation that leads the way in industrial progress and that more than any other nation weeds out old machinery and replaces it by the newest appliances, should be either unable or unwilling to modernize thoroughly its financial system and to discard old-fashioned financial machinery which other people have long since thrown upon the scrap heap."

Mr. Justice Brandeis, in "Other People's Money," said:

"The great monopoly in this country is the money monopoly. So long as that exists our old variety and freedom and individual energy of development are out of the question. A great industrial nation is controlled by its system of credit. Our system of credit is concentrated. The growth of the Nation, therefore, and all our activities are in the hands of a few men who, even if their actions be honest and intended for the public interest, are necessarily concentrated upon the great undertakings in which their own money is involved and who necessarily, by every reason of their own limitations, chill and check and destroy genuine economic freedom. This is the greatest question of all; and to this statesmen must address themselves with an earnest determination to serve the long future and the true liberties of men."

The Reichsbank of Germany has a foreign portfolio which has increased in importance from year to year until the paralysis of the present war, but the German Government is now making the most elaborate plans for protecting its commerce after the war, to the ends of the earth, with proper credit and banking facilities.

The Bank of France has the right to discount foreign paper, and is using it with great ability. But France is also making elaborate preparations for safeguarding its commerce at the end of the war.

The Bank of England has relied upon acceptance houses and private bankers in England to handle a large part of the foreign banking business, but nevertheless the English Government is now making elaborate preparations to safeguard its commerce, providing adequate credit and banking facilities throughout the world at the end of this war. The details of what is being done by Great Britain and by France I add as a supplement to my remarks as taken from the Commerce Reports, December 27 and 28, 1917, pages 1177 and 1194. I ask to have those exhibits printed without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. OWEN. No thoughtful man can deny that the United States must rise in its dignity and majesty of power and adequately meet the demands which will arise at the immediate close of this great world war.

What I have desired to point out, Mr. President and gentlemen of the Senate, is that our present facilities and our present statutes have proven ineffective. We authorized the Federal Reserve Board to require the Federal reserve banks to establish this foreign accommodation and it has not been done; and I do not think it would be easy to accomplish it through the mechanism, for instance, of the Federal reserve bank of New York, for the reason that the directorship of the Federal reserve bank at New York City is controlled by a few banks that are engaged in these international banking operations, and they probably would regard it as trespassing upon their preserves in some way. They will not stop to digest it. They will regard it as an innovation, just as they did the Federal reserve act, and they will be opposed to it; and I have no doubt that they have been enabled to prevent its being done in New York, although I have no detailed information about that. But I will say that the Federal reserve bank of New York has enough to do to handle the great volume of domestic business piling in upon them; and that work, I am sure, they have done with great ability and with great efficiency.

What I want to point out is the need for a mechanism by which the commerce and industry and manufacturing powers of the people of the United States shall have the means of imports and exports, shall have the opportunity of buying and selling bills of exchange against imports and exports, and shall have the necessary credit facilities, and shall have a competent authority where a merchant can wire and ask whether or not a merchant in Buenos Aires has a good credit, and whether he would be safe in making an important shipment of merchandise to him from the United States. Until our people have that kind of information conveniently at their hands, free from any suspicion of personal interest, the commerce and industry of the people of the United States will not have the means for adequately expanding.

I regard this matter as one of very great importance, and will have it considered in due time by the Committee on Banking and Currency of the Senate; and I hope the House committee will consider it, and that we may arrive at some substantial adjustment of the matter.

I thank the Senate for its patience.

EXHIBIT A.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
BUREAU OF FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC COMMERCE,
Washington, February 4, 1918.

IMPORTS AND EXPORTS, BY GRAND DIVISIONS AND COUNTRIES.

Total values of merchandise imported from and exported to each of the principal countries during December, 1917, and the 12 months ended December, 1917, compared with corresponding periods of the preceding year, were made public to-day by the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce of the Department of Commerce, as follows:

Imports from—	Month of December—		12 months ended December—

[Editorial, Arthur Brisbane, Esq., Washington Times.]

TO THE PRESIDENT AND MR. MCADOO—IS THERE ANY WAY OF MAKING THE AMERICAN DOLLAR WORTH 100 CENTS IN NEUTRAL COUNTRIES ABROAD?

This question, it seems to us, is important.

The United States has forbidden gold exports, which is wise. Since gold is a fetish among the nations, let us keep our fetish supply at home.

But while we keep our gold at home, let us arrange in some way so that the American dollar will not be marked down too low on the bargain counter of other countries.

The dollar in Spain is worth 75 cents or less in Spanish money.

The same thing is true of China, Sweden, Norway, Holland, and Denmark. In all the neutral countries the American dollar is worth much less than 100 cents.

There ought to be some way to stop this.

Mr. Warburg, of the Federal reserve bank, might devote his mind to the problem—he has excellent financial ability.

This is written primarily for the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury.

If it is the duty of the Government to protect the American citizen abroad, it is also the duty of the Government to protect the dollar abroad. The dollar travels and buys for the citizen.

Federal reserve exchange and credit banks on the other side properly organized would be able to attend to the matter.

This is a creditor Nation in every sense of the word.

The world owes us billions.

And our exports are far in excess of our imports.

In other words, the outside countries, including the neutrals, owe us much more than we owe them. Therefore our dollar should be the best dollar.

The thing can be arranged, and it ought to be.

The four big neutral countries—Spain, Norway, Netherlands, Denmark—owe us every year tens of millions more than we owe them, because our exports exceed our imports.

Spain, for instance, must pay us forty-one millions more than we pay to Spain in one year.

Our money ought to be at a premium; it is just the other way round.

Senator OWEN, chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee of the United States Senate, is to be congratulated upon the interest that he has shown in this unnatural and harmful condition.

The American buying in a neutral country should not be obliged to pay $1.25 for $1 worth of goods.

And the buyer from a neutral country should not be able to buy a dollar's worth of American goods for 75 cents of his own money. And that is the present condition.

FUTURE CONDITIONS OF FOREIGN TRADE.

The bill introduced by Senator OWEN to establish in connection with the Federal Reserve System of banking an organization designed to furnish facilities not now available for the promotion of American foreign trade seems to be a step in the right direction. The idea is that the Federal foreign-trade bank shall occupy somewhat the same position toward international trade that the reserve banks at present occupy toward domestic trade. As matters stand, private banks can extend a certain amount of credit to exporters and importers, and may derive some assistance from the reserve banks by having their foreign bills rediscounted under prescribed restrictions. Should the proposed system come into operation, the investment of an individual bank in foreign bills, being readily subject to rediscount, would become practically as liquid as its domestic commercial paper, which can be immediately discounted at the reserve banks. Under the existing system banks sometimes hesitate to invest heavily in foreign bills because in case of stringency they might not be readily salable. The foreign-trade bank, however, would provide an immediate market for such bills, and when exchange was scarce and rates tended to advance would ease the situation by selling exchange and so helping to lessen the fluctuation in rates. All this is very much to the good, and, considering the soundness of the axiom that trade follows the loan, the proposed legislation, properly guarded, could hardly fail to be of substantial service to the men engaged in expanding the foreign trade of the United States.

But in this matter it is well to keep a firm hold on first principles. The United States grew and prospered and built up great wealth out of the natural resources of this continent. But there has been a steady flow of raw materials from this country to Great Britain and western Europe, to be there manufactured and distributed around the world. A protective tariff enabled us to keep some of these materials for manufacture here, chiefly for domestic consumption. But the necessity of the tariff was an admission that the sum of the influences for cheap production and distribution was against us. These influences were chiefly the supply, first, of labor and then of capital, but they included experience in industry and foreign trade, and the prestige, good will, and facilities of an established business. The superabundance of capital which existed in Great Britain before the war caused an overflow from that country to be directed around the world. There was thus developed in the United Kingdom a large body of investors accustomed to employ their capital in other countries, and their investments naturally became the channels of outlet for the products of British industry, just as the returns that came to them were the means of financing British imports. There has been a great, free, readily accessible market in London for all the commodities of commerce, not merely a market for the country's own products and for what it consumes, but a distributing market for the rest of the world. British ships have been in every port, British bankers and traders in every mart. There has been British capital available everywhere, ready to build a railway, buy a brewery, open a mine, or move the products of the country to market. It is the combination of these conditions which made London the clearing center of the world and the pound sterling the standard of value.

Our success in taking the place that rightly belongs to us in the markets of the world must largely depend on our readiness to imitate the liberal conception of what really constitutes commerce which gave the United Kingdom the position which it had attained. One of the last words of the late President McKinley was a warning against the illusion that we could possibly have a permanently one-sided trade, but there are abundant evidences that the false conception which he tried to dissipate still retains a good deal of its vitality. If Great Britain must resume her financial and industrial rôle after the war, with greatly impaired resources and enormously increased burdens, she at least takes up the commercial struggle with the enormous advantage of having to learn very little about the conditions under which it can be most successfully prosecuted. In one respect the war has been almost incredibly beneficial to British industry, and that is by demonstrating the extraordinary gains that may be made in manufacturing efficiency. Take, for example, this illuminating passage from a book just published by authority of the Council of the British Association on Industry and Finance: "The increased output in shells which has in large measure been attained since the foundation of the ministry of munitions and the subsequent recruitment of female labor for work in the factories, with all the adaptation and rearrangement that has been effected for the purpose of speeding up, has never been more strikingly illustrated than when it was officially declared that a year's output at the rate attained in 1914–15 is now provided in the following periods: Eighteen-pounder ammunition, in 13 days; heavy howitzer shells, in 7 days; shells for medium guns and howitzers, in 5 days; shells for heavy guns, in less than a day." As the London Economist remarks, this record not only shows a wonderful achievement in time of war, but gives serious reasons for thought concerning the inefficiency, whatever may have been its cause, of the organization on which it has been an improvement. That the keying-up process has not been confined to war industries is sufficiently evident from the returns of British foreign trade for the last calendar year. Here commercial exports figure for the very respectable total of $2,625,000,000, which, though less than half the total of our own export trade, excludes most of the supplies incidental to the promotion of the war, which in our case figure for over $600,000,000. It may be incidentally noted that the British exports for the year of cotton yarns and textiles aggregated $730,000,000, while our own appear to have been very little in excess of $150,000,000. That a Britain with only one arm free should have been able to make such a record in the competition for the world's trade suggests possibilities, of which we would do well to take heed, of what may be accomplished by a Britain with both arms available for industrial production.

CAPITAL FOR AFTER-WAR TRADE.

[Alfred Nutting, clerk in American Consulate General, London, England, Nov. 30.]

The minister of reconstruction has established, in conjunction with the treasury, a committee on financial facilities after the war, the object of which is to anticipate and provide methods to overcome the financial difficulties that will arise in connection with commerce and industry. The vast number of factories which have been diverted from their normal trade to war work will face a critical period between the time when hostilities cease and the time when it is possible for them to return to their prewar activities, for an interval more or less lengthy must occur during which it will not be possible to revert to former productiveness, while the question of cost in restoring factories to conditions formerly prevailing will require careful consideration and the preparation of plans to provide the necessary money and capital. Apart from that aspect there is the certainty that largely increased costs of raw materials, higher wages, and a much greater value on stock in hand or on credit will have to be met, requiring fresh capital, while longer credit may be necessary.

Some of the most important matters with which the committee will be empowered to deal will be the extent of the aid that banks and financial houses will be able to render; if such help should appear likely to prove insufficient, what other sources of credit can be sought; and by what method can the required capital be most efficiently distributed, in the event of a shortage, among essential trades and commerce.

COMMITTEE REPRESENTS ALL BRANCHES OF COMMERCE AND INDUSTRY.

The members of the committee appointed to deal with this fundamental subject of finance and capital after the war include representatives of banking, financial, commercial, and industrial circles, and are not restricted to London concerns, but include those vitally interested in industries and workshops throughout the country. The chairman of the committee, Sir R. V. Vassar-Smith, Bart. (chairman of Lloyd's Bank, one of the two largest banking corporations in the United Kingdom), in a recent address before the Institute of Bankers, said:

"The financing of our industries will be immensely facilitated by trade organization. During the war we have seen our productive industries organized on a large scale and under the control of the State. Both organization and control were forced upon us by war. As regards State control, I hope and believe that the necessity for it is temporary. As to trade organization, I firmly believe that the necessity for it will remain after the war. It is no new thing, this tendency to production and organization on a large scale, though it has not shown itself so much in this country as in some others. The day of small industries on individual lines is gone. Our manufacturers and traders must organize for united effort. This will have the closest bearing on questions of finance. An unstable, unorganized industry is the despair of bankers. I have confidence in stating that an industry organized on large lines has seldom lacked financial support in this country, and in spite of financial stringency, which we shall doubtless have to face, it is not likely to suffer in the future."

It is stated that the committee will commence work immediately.

FRENCH PREPARATIONS FOR TRADE AFTER WAR.

[Commercial Attaché C. W. A. Veditz, Paris, Oct. 26.]

Since the outbreak of the war numerous French writers upon commerce and industry have discussed in detail the economic consequences of the war and the problems of reorganization that will need to be solved after the termination of hostilities. Nearly all of them have insisted upon the importance of developing France's export trade, and their suggestions in this connection have been both critical and constructive. That is to say, they have pointed out those features of the present situation that must be remedied and have also proposed a series of new measures and organizations that are now totally lacking.

Naturally enough, the French foreign service has been subjected to a critical examination with regard to its efficiency as an agency for the promotion of export trade; and an impression has prevailed that it is susceptible of improvement in that respect.

The chief Government agency for the promotion of French export trade in the office national du commerce extérieur, intrusted by the law of March 4, 1898, with the task of furnishing French merchants and manufacturers with such commercial information as is likely to contribute to the development of French foreign trade and the expansion of French markets in foreign countries and in the French colonies and protectorates. The office national has the aid in this task of three groups of agencies—the diplomatic and consular services, the French chambers of commerce, and the foreign-trade counselors. The office maintains a collection of foreign-trade catalogues, which it analyzes and brings to the attention of interested French firms. It puts the benefit of its investigations at the disposal of French merchants and manufacturers. Unlike the United States Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, which is the corresponding American institution, it furnishes confidential information concerning the standing and financial resources of particular foreign firms. The office receives daily inquiries from foreign agents and importers, who are put in touch with French firms that have indicated an interest in foreign markets, and it keeps a classified list of French exporters. The office also undertakes to bring together groups of French exporters who would be unable individually to maintain an export organization. Whenever the office has cognizance of foreign-trade opportunities, particularly of important orders to be placed competitively by public or private corporations, such opportunities are brought to the attention of interested French chambers of commerce, trade associations, or even individual firms whose names are registered with the office.

THE FOUR DEPARTMENTS AND THEIR FUNCTIONS.

The work of the office is carried on by four departments. The first has to do with publications and information concerning the commercial standing and reputation of foreign houses. The publications of the office are the following:

The Moniteur Officiel du Commerce is normally issued every Monday. Its publication ceased at the outbreak of the war but will shortly be resumed. The Moniteur reports changes in foreign tariff laws, in French commercial legislation, and in the commercial laws of foreign countries. This publication has the exclusive right to the reports of French consuls and diplomats on commercial subjects. In brief, the Moniteur is the commercial-information periodical of the French Government, resembling in general the daily Commerce Reports of the American Government. It contains the trade opportunities brought to its notice that are likely to interest French exporters and manufacturers.

The office ordinarily issues weekly a Feuille d'Information, or Bulletin of Information. This publication also was stopped at the outbreak of the war but will soon be taken up again. It contains the more important news items and reports issued in the Moniteur Officiel. This bulletin is regarded as an efficient agency of trade propaganda; it has a large circulation in France and is posted publicly in railway stations, city halls, schools of commerce, and other places where it is likely to attract public attention. Its aim is to furnish general trade information and to stimulate an interest in export trade, even among those manufacturers and tradesmen who have previously shown no disposition to seek business in foreign markets.

The third class of publications of the Office National consists of the so-called Dossiers Commerciaux, or commercial documents, each relating to a particular commodity or group of commodities, or to the export market offered by a particular country or district. These documents often contain confidential information not intended for general circulation. They furnish detailed and specialized information along some specific line, likely to interest only those French dealers or manufacturers engaged in that line. They are furnished only to bona fide French firms located either in France or in its colonies.

Finally, the office publishes, in the form of monographs, the results of special investigations into the market for particular products singled out for such surveys. There have already been published such special monographs relating to wines, cutlery, porcelain, glassware, canned-food products, and the collection of credit claims abroad. The most recent of these Notes Commerciales concern the different sections of Morocco, investigated from the standpoint of exports and imports and with regard to agriculture and colonization.

The office national furnishes, free of charge, information concerning the standing and commercial rating of foreign firms and has in its files a large collection of catalogued cards enabling it in many instances to furnish such data without delay. It also furnishes the names of lawyers prepared to take charge of claims for the collection of unpaid bills abroad.

Another department of the office is concerned with the dispensation of general commercial information, the transmission of samples, and the furnishing of technical data. It undertakes to provide exporters of a given product with data concerning the principal nations exporting that product and with details concerning the requirements of particular markets. It furnishes lists of foreign dealers and importers and undertakes, on behalf of French inquirers, to purchase, on their account, samples, catalogues, and so forth.

A third department of the office specializes in matters of customs tariffs and trade statistics. It undertakes to furnish information with regard to import and export duties, commercial and navigation treaties and regulations, importation in bond, certificates of origin, trade-marks and patents, etc. It also seeks to keep fully informed concerning statistics of production, consumption, imports, and exports.

A fourth division of the office national is concerned with transportation matters. It keeps track of transportation charges, both by water and by rail, of ocean freight and insurance rates, of postal charges and regulations, of telegraphic rates and regulations, of port charges and navigation taxes.

ASSOCIATION NATIONALE D'EXPANSION ECONOMIQUE.

Since the outbreak of the war the importance of encouraging French export trade, particularly after the termination of the conflict, has seemed to warrant the establishment of several new organizations and agencies, and special attention has been given to the efficiency of German methods of trade expansion (as set forth, for example, by Henri Hauser in his book, Les Méthodes Allemandes d'Expansion Commerciale). Several new groups have been founded to aid and encourage the exportation of French products. The first and one of the most important of these is the Association Nationale d'Expansion Economique, formed under the leadership of the Paris Chamber of Commerce, which is a semiofficial organization having close relations with the French Government and especially with the ministry of commerce. The purpose of this organization is to prepare for competition after the war, for the new economic and commercial dispensation that will inevitably follow the cessation of hostilities. The association is divided into several committees intrusted with the study of particular branches of the export trade. It comprises the most important, if not all, of the chambers of commerce throughout France and of the various manufacturers' and merchants' associations in the Republic.

This association held an important commercial congress last March, which was presided over by the minister of commerce and which discussed some of the more important problems that will confront the nation in connection with the resumption of normal economic life at the end of the war. The most important single accomplishment of the association thus far is the preparation and publication of a rather complete survey of the industry, commerce, and agriculture of France, with particular reference to the problems and conditions that will arise after peace is restored. The reports in which the results of this survey are given number 70, and their subjects are as follows: General report; the woolen industry; the felt industry; silk and silk goods; ribbons and silk and textiles partly of silk; trimmings and braid; ready-made clothing; the cotton industry; flax and hemp goods; laces and embroideries; jute; hosiery and knit goods; dressmaking; women's wear ("la mode"); furs, lingeries, perfumery, etc.; leather, hides, and shoes; chemical fertilizers and other chemical products used in agriculture; dyestuffs; the products of large-scale chemical industry; coal; the extractive industries; the metallurgical industries; mechanical construction; electrical materials and construction; hardware; watches and clocks; optical glass; the photographic and cinematographic industries; jewelry; toys; ceramics and glassware; chirurgical and sanitary articles; paper; book publishing; resin and resinous products; trade in wood and lumber; food products; fishing; the merchant marine; mineral-water and health resorts; the hotel industry and tourist business; banking and credit; insurance; colonial administration; the cereal crops; the cattle industry; the meat industry; cattle raising in the colonies; dairy products; the exportation of wines; the exportation of liqueurs; forestry after the war; fruit and truck farming; horticulture; industrial plants (beet sugar, hemp, hops, etc.); the trade in seed; agricultural resources of colonial France; agricultural machinery and equipment; agricultural labor; the exportation of farm products (on which subject there are nine reports, covering the principal export markets for French agricultural products).

The Association Nationale maintains a bureau of commercial information prepared to advise French exporters concerning customs duties, import and export regulations, black lists and the blockade, transportation rates and regulations, the exchange situation, taxes, antifraud legislation, colonial conditions, and trade opportunities. It also maintains a department for commercial translation work and issues a bulletin designed to keep its members informed promptly of changes in commercial laws, tariff rates, etc. The association will publish annually an Index of French Producers in the French, English, and Spanish languages, to be circulated widely among foreign jobbers, purchasers, and importers. It has already begun the publication of a monthly review, called L'Expansion Economique, containing a section of industrial and commercial notes, a section of agricultural notes, articles on current economic topics, and a summary of industrial and commercial news relating to France and the principal commercial nations of the world.

OTHER NEW ORGANIZATIONS TO PROMOTE AND PROTECT FRENCH TRADE.

Of somewhat more recent formation than the Association Nationale is the Union Nationale pour l'Exportation des Produits Français et pour l'Importation des Matières Premières, founded by M. Raoul Peret, former minister of commerce. This organization seeks above all to encourage the grouping of French manufacturers and dealers in order that by this means smaller producers who are unable independently to maintain an export organization may be able to enter the export trade. It is believed that by forming such cooperative groups of comparatively small concerns it will be possible to deal advantageously with steamship and railroad companies and to obtain the special benefits now confined to the larger establishments that have created and maintained their own export organizations. It is the ambition of this association to foster the creation of such groups and to create transportation companies under its own control.

Quite different are the aims of the Union Intersyndicale des Marques (a union of manufacturers' associations for the protection of trade-marks), founded by a well-known electrical engineer, M. Raynald Legouez. The main purpose of this organization is to protect French manufactures against imitation and misrepresentation. It is held that the Germans have been in the habit of selling their own goods as of French manufacture, not only on neutral markets but even in France; also that products nearly finished in Germany have in the past been shipped to France and finished there in order that they might be sold as French goods. The Union Intersyndicale is therefore carrying on an active campaign to persuade French manufacturers to place upon the market only goods that bear the distinctive label of the union—with the letters U. N. I. S.—as a guaranty of French origin. The union hopes to include all important groups of French manufacturers and thus to prevent the sale of goods that are not marked with the label of the union.

MOVEMENT FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF ANNUAL FAIRS.

In addition to organizations of the kind described, attention should be called to the movement in France in favor of annual fairs or markets comparable to the famous German fairs at Leipzig. The first experiment in this direction was made by Senator Herriot, the mayor of Lyon, in March, 1916, when Lyon held its first sample fair (Foire d'Échantillons) and 1,342 exhibitors took part. The second Lyon fair, held in March and April, 1917, was attended by 2,593 exhibitors, 424 of them being from foreign countries, with 25 representing American firms. It is reported that during the fair the exhibiting firms obtained orders amounting to about 200,000,000 francs.

In September, 1916, Bordeaux held a fair, but this was considered as devoted especially to the products of French colonies and to wines and foodstuffs, for which Bordeaux has always been a center of great importance. The second Bordeaux fair, held in September, 1917, repeated the success of the first.

In May, 1917, Paris inaugurated a fair, in which special attention was given to the so-called "articles de Paris" and "articles de luxe" that play so important a part in the industrial and commercial life of the French capital. Other cities have indicated a disposition to undertake similar projects; it is stated, for example, that Marseille contemplates having its annual fair. There is, of course, some danger here that the rivalry of French cities may militate against the establishment of a fair that will be truly national or international, and it now appears likely that the fairs of Paris and Bordeaux will specialize in certain groups of commodities, in the production or handling of which these cities play a leading part, whereas the Lyon fair will be of a more general character and thus become a real rival of the one at Leipzig.

NEW COMMERCIAL PUBLICATIONS.

In addition to the new organizations to which reference has been made, and to the newly established French fairs, the awakening interest in French export trade is manifested by the publication of a large number of new reviews, newspapers, and other periodicals devoted to commercial subjects, and especially to the expansion of French foreign trade. Easily the foremost of these is the Exportateur Français, published weekly under the editorship of Maurice Ajam, deputy and former under secretary of state. Mention should also be made of Le Soir, a daily commercial newspaper; La Victoire Economique, a weekly newspaper; Le Moniteur du Commerce, published weekly; L'Initiative Commerciale, a monthly review; Commerce et Industrie, a monthly; and Mercure, the organ of the French Federation of International Commerce. All these publications give special attention to French export trade.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 25, 1918.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Rabbi Abram Simon, Ph. D., Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Deeply conscious that Thy presence consecrates every place where Thy name is called upon in humility and sincerity, we fervently invoke Thy abiding grace, our God and Father. Profoundly grateful for our noble past, we are earnestly prayerful for the continued prosperity of an equally worthy present. Reliant on Thy everlasting arms we pray that our thoughts and labors for our country may be worthy of Thy acceptance, even as they have the approval of our conscience. We ask for insight to see our duty, for courage to carry it to a successful issue, for faith in the ultimate triumph of our cause, conceived in justice and dedicated to Thy name and the happiness of Thy children. Bless the dauntless loyalty of our men, the matchless steadfastness of our women, and the invincible fortitude of our sons here and abroad. Thou art the Ally of every just cause. Therefore we trust in Thee and despair not. Teach us to read Thy will aright, to follow it bravely and honorably, and thus to make it our own. To Thee be all the glory, now and evermore. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the considering of the antiprofiteering bill, which was under consideration several days ago and which was not completed, and pending that, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that in event a unanimous-consent agreement can be reached by which the bill to which I have just referred can be considered and made a standing order for consideration immediately upon the conclusion of the railroad bill, which was pending in the House on Saturday, that I would not insist upon the motion which I have just made.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say in connection with the suggestion of the gentleman from Kentucky that I have inquired and find that there was a unanimous-consent order made a few days ago, on Friday, I believe, when the pension bills were to be considered, which were in order on that day, that the pension bill then on the calendar was to be taken up and considered immediately following the disposition of the railroad bill, which I did not know——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I did not know that, either.

The SPEAKER. It will not take long to get rid of the pension bill.

Mr. SIMS. I know it will not. Now, I want to make another statement. I appreciate the attitude of the gentleman from Kentucky and think he is yielding something that perhaps he has got a right to proceed with to-day. I concede the importance of his measure, but in view of the great importance of the pending bill and the fact that we are right in the midst of the amendment stage of it, I hope that unanimous consent may be given to the gentleman from Kentucky to call up the bill for consideration immediately following the disposition of the pension bill which is to follow the disposition of the railroad bill. I make that unanimous request modified to the extent of the pension bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to both gentlemen that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] has a preferential status in the House this morning of 30 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I recall that.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, if I recollect aright, there is another agreement, and that is that the bill of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] shall follow this bill. Was not that agreement made? I shall object to any tying up in the future——

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is the order made in the House granting precedence to the gentleman from Tennessee to consider the railroad bill of that character that it displaces District business?

The SPEAKER. Why, the Chair tried to investigate the thing, and it was not done in a very scientific way. If the order the gentleman from Tennessee obtained had made this bill a continuing order, there would be no question in the mind of the Chair that he had undoubtedly the right of way; but he did not do that, but just simply made it in order to be called up. Now, the rules of the House fix this day as District day and by a vote of the House the Chair recollects it, although the RECORD does not seem to carry out his recollection about it, there was some kind of a motion about fixing this bill of the gentleman from Kentucky for to-day; but anyhow——

Mr. STAFFORD. On that point, if the Chair will indulge me, at that time general debate was exhausted during the consideration of the so-called District profiteering bill, and at that time no order had been made for the consideration of this highly important railroad bill, and it was naturally understood that the profiteering bill would be considered in order when District business was in order. Since then, however, the House has made some order to give preference to the railroad bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows; but the House did not make an order to make it a continuing order. The Chair will state that the whole thing can be straightened out by agreeing to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee to make this bill of the gentleman from Kentucky in order immediately after the disposition of the pension bill.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, in view of the situation now——

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. SIMS. Is there objection?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, my distinct recollection is I asked unanimous consent that the railroad-control bill be taken up following the deficiency appropriation bill and to be considered until finished, but some gentleman objected to it, and I believe the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] said, "Get your consent first," and in that way the RECORD appears as it does; but I understand, Mr. Speaker, that if the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider District business should be voted down it would be in order to make the motion which I will then be ready to make on the railroad bill.

The SPEAKER. Unless we are prevented by some other unanimous-consent order.

Mr. STAFFORD. My recollection is the gentleman from Illinois was granted 30 minutes following the reading of the Journal.

Mr. RAINEY. I will tell you: I have 30 minutes following the reading of the Journal and disposition of matters on the Speaker's table, provided this railroad bill is disposed of. If this railroad bill is under consideration, I have my privilege at the conclusion of it.

Mr. SIMS. Of course, the gentleman from Illinois would not have the right if we go into consideration of the railroad bill?

Mr. RAINEY. But if you go into consideration of this other bill I would.

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] want his 30 minutes this morning?

Mr. RAINEY. I have no preference as to when I have it.

The SPEAKER. I know, but the Chair wants to recognize these men.

Mr. RAINEY. If the railroad bill is taken up, I am not entitled to it. But if it is not I am entitled.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] will be voted on with the distinct understanding that if we go into the Committee of the Whole on his bill the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] shall have his 30 minutes before we actually go in.

Mr. SIMS. Provided the House goes into the Committee of the Whole on District business?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Kentucky is that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9248.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, if that is for the purpose, and of course it is, of taking up the important matter of the railroad bill we ought to have a full attendance here. I move a call of the House.

Mr. SIMS. That will make two roll calls instead of one.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] makes the point of order that there is no quorum present, and evidently there is none. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Will those who favor going into the Committee of the Whole on the profiteering bill vote "yea"?

The SPEAKER. Yes. Those who favor going into the Committee of the Whole on the profiteering bill will, when their names are called, answer "yea," and those opposed will answer "nay."

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARKLEY. If this motion is voted down, it will be in order to go into the Committee of the Whole on the railroad bill?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 60, nays 248, not voting 120, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present, and the Doorkeeper will open the doors.

FEDERAL CONTROL OF RAILROAD TRANSPORTATION.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill 9685; and, pending that motion, I want to submit a request for unanimous consent. The request is that this bill shall be the continuing order of the House until disposed of, subject to Calendar Wednesday, conference reports, or privileged matters.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that this railroad bill shall be the continuing order until its conclusion, barring Calendar Wednesday, conference reports, and privileged matters. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the last order was rather vague. The gentleman says, "Except privileged matters." Does he include appropriation bills? Why not have this continuing order subject to conference reports and matters in order on Calendar Wednesday?

Mr. SIMS. I will be glad to put it in that shape.

Mr. STAFFORD. If it is of that pressing importance, I submit it should be worded in that shape.

Mr. SIMS. I ask that it shall be made the continuing order, subject to conference reports and matters in order on Calendar Wednesday.

The SPEAKER. As to questions of privilege, no agreement that the House can make can shut out questions of personal privilege and questions of highest privilege.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BURNETT. The order in regard to the alien-slacker bill was that it should be made the continuing order Wednesday and until concluded. Suppose it was not completed on Calendar Wednesday. Would that stop it from going on next day, under this order of the House?

The SPEAKER. This is in order on next Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. BURNETT. Suppose we do not get through on Calendar Wednesday. Would this come in, and, so far as that continuing order made last Wednesday in regard to the alien slacker bill is concerned, would that be superseded? If so, I shall object.

The SPEAKER. This order that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] asks for, if it were granted, being subsequent to the other order, would upset the order of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BURNETT. Then, if the gentleman would modify his request so that it will not interfere with the continuing order as to the alien slacker bill, I shall not object.

Mr. SIMS. Of course I would not want to have it interfere with the other order. Of course I would make it subject to that order that has already been made.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the railroad bill be made the continuing order until completed, barring Calendar Wednesday and the space occupied by the order which the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] got, and matters of personal and other sorts of privilege. Is there objection?

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I do not think we ought to tie the House. We are constantly doing that. There is no reason why the gentleman should not get his bill through to-day and to-morrow, and if he gets it through to-morrow there will be no need of getting the order.

Mr. SIMS. I can not know when we shall be able to conclude the bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. Nobody can know; but we constantly get into trouble by tying up the House by special orders.

Mr. SIMS. We are already tied up.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SHERLEY. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky objects.

Mr. SIMS. Then, Mr. Speaker, I submit another unanimous-consent request, pending the motion. I ask unanimous consent that this bill be considered and concluded in Committee of the Whole not later than the adjournment of the House to-morrow.

Mr. MADDEN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman that he simply go on with his bill to-day and to-morrow. Nobody is going to interfere with his bill being taken up to-morrow, if necessary.

Mr. SIMS. I have made a unanimous-consent request which I considered in the interest of the position of the bill.

The SPEAKER. What is the gentleman's request?

Mr. SIMS. None will be accepted.

Mr. DOWELL. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded. The regular order is, Shall the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of this railroad bill? The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 9685) to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes, with Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9685, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9685) to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LENROOT: Page 1, line 10, after the word "compensation" strike out the words "not exceeding" and, on page 2, lines 2 and 3, strike out the words "equivalent as nearly as may be to" and insert in lieu thereof the words "not exceeding."

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin a question. Will he yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. Is this the amendment that the gentleman offered on Saturday?

Mr. LENROOT. It is the same.

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment again reported? I ask that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, this is the first of several perfecting amendments which I have heretofore given notice I would offer.

Before discussing this particular amendment I want to say a word that will apply to all of the perfecting amendments that I shall offer. I anticipate, Mr. Chairman, that the chairman of the committee will take the position that inasmuch as his committee has not had the opportunity to consider these perfecting amendments the House should disagree to all of them, irrespective of their merits, with the idea that when this bill gets into conference the conferees may then take up these propositions and adjust them.

Mr. Chairman, as to that, there are two considerations which ought to apply, and the first is that this House, if it has any respect for itself, ought not to permit a bill to go from this House where there is a clearly apparent absurdity in the bill, and that where an amendment is offered that is clearly designed to correct that absurdity and to express the very meaning that the committee has in mind, if it is clear that the language of the bill does not so express it, then instead of rejecting the amendment it ought to be accepted.

We find in the Senate bill many of these errors, including the one now under consideration. The Senate has made exactly the same mistake that has been made here, and the result is that unless something is put in its place now both Houses will have identical language agreed upon, where upon consideration no lawyer will say that the language agreed upon expresses the intent of either House of Congress. And I want to call attention to the fact that while the House has a liberal rule with reference to the power of conferees, even though there is identical language agreed upon in a House bill and in a Senate bill, the rule is different in that body over at the other end of the Capitol. I have had occasion, particularly on the Alaska leasing bill, to ascertain that fact. In that case we passed a substitute bill, and we found that neither House had expressed the correct intent, and the conferees took the liberty of rewriting a certain section so as to express the intent. The Senate sent that bill back to conference, and we had to accept in the Alaska leasing bill phraseology that neither House wanted. We ought to avoid that, so that instead of the chairman of the committee rejecting amendments where it is clear that amendments ought to be made, if he wants to get these things into conference he ought to accept the amendments, and that will clearly throw it into conference, where the conferees can adjust it.

Now, with reference to this particular amendment, as the language now reads not a man in this House will say that the language in this bill expresses the intent of the committee. What does it authorize as it now stands? It authorizes the President to make an agreement with the carriers to do what? To make an agreement to guarantee that they shall not receive more than a certain sum as compensation. That is what the agreement is. What carrier would care for an agreement of that kind? Of what benefit would it be to any carrier to get an agreement from the President of the United States to say, "We will guarantee you, Pennsylvania Railroad, that you shall not receive during Federal control more than $50,000,000 a year in compensation for your property"? Now, of course, what the committee had in mind was to authorize the President to make an agreement with the railroads for a fixed sum, and provide that in making that agreement he should not go beyond a certain maximum sum fixed by Congress; in other words, in the illustration I have made of the Pennsylvania road the maximum that we authorized him to agree upon, we will say, is $50,000,000; but if he can make an agreement with the Pennsylvania Railroad for $40,000,000, we wish to leave him free to do that. But under the language as it stands that can not be done, and my amendment provides, in the first place, to strike out the words "not exceeding," and authorizes the President to fix and agree upon a fixed sum that they shall receive.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LENROOT. I ask for five minutes more, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LENROOT. And then, to carry out the plain intent of the committee, on page 2 I provide for striking out the words "equivalent as nearly as may be to" and inserting "not exceeding the average annual income of the railroads for this three-year period." That makes it entirely plain. There can then be no question about what the authority of the President is; that he is authorized by this language to agree with the railroads to pay them a fixed sum, but that fixed sum shall not be greater than the three-year average that is provided in the bill.

Mr. DOREMUS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. DOREMUS. Will the gentleman inform the committee as to his purpose in proposing to strike out the words "equivalent, as nearly as may be"? It is my opinion that those words ought to remain in, and I want to get the gentleman's view of it.

Mr. LENROOT. Because, when you are making merely a standard, a measure, to fix a maximum sum, "equivalent" means nothing, and that is all that is desired—to fix in each case a sum, and to lay down a rule by which that sum is to be determined.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is not the gentleman assuming, however, that the character of bookkeeping of every railroad is such as to make its annual return for three years past an accurate measure, whereas in point of fact that assumption is not true?

Mr. LENROOT. Whether it is true or not, the gentleman must remember that with the bill as amended the return of the carrier does not fix the sum which the carrier is entitled to receive at all. It fixes merely the maximum sum.

Mr. SHERLEY. It ought not to fix that, if the character of the bookkeeping is such as not to make it a proper standard; and so the words "as nearly equivalent as may be" are used to give some leeway as to the bookkeeping methods of the railroads.

Mr. DOREMUS. My idea is the same as that of the gentleman from Kentucky. It is notorious that certain railroad companies, in order to make a return to their stockholders, have skinned their lines. In other words, they have not set aside the proper amount for maintenance and depreciation. Now, as to those lines it might be the judgment of the President that a larger sum ought during Federal control to be set aside for maintenance and depreciation; and yet that would prevent the railroads affected from declaring the same return that they have formerly declared. So I think the language of the bill ought to be left so that, no matter whether the railroad gets its return in dividends to its stockholders or in the improvement and upkeep of the property itself, we ought to be in a position to say that the return is an equivalent of that which they formerly received.

Mr. LENROOT. I will say to the gentleman that I have no intention in this amendment of disturbing in any way any idea that the committee had in that respect; and I am perfectly willing to modify my amendment by leaving in the words "equivalent as nearly as may be" and inserting before the word "equivalent" the words "not exceeding a sum" which will maintain the thought and intent of the committee; and I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the second part of my amendment be again reported, striking out what I proposed and inserting after the word "control," in line 2, the words "not exceeding a sum."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. LENROOT offers a modified amendment, as follows: On page 2, line 2, after the word "control," insert the words "not exceeding a sum."

Mr. LENROOT. Now, Mr. Chairman, that removes that controversy and leaves it as it was intended. I want to follow up with one observation and then I will yield. As the language now stands, the standard return, unless my amendment be adopted, is not the sum which the President is authorized to agree with the railroad that it shall receive, but this maximum sum, whereas all through the bill the standard sum is the sum that the President is authorized to agree upon. Of course that was not the intention. If the question of the standard return be the fixed sum, you have provided that the standard return shall be determined by the Interstate Commerce Commission, while it was clearly the intention of the committee to give the President the authority to determine that fixed sum, Congress only providing the maximum.

Now, if my amendment be adopted, it will provide that the President is authorized to agree with the railroads to pay them an annual sum fixed by him as compensation, but that sum shall not exceed the equivalent as nearly as may be to the three-year average. That makes it entirely clear, and certainly carries out the intention of the committee, while the present language does not.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to state in connection with these proposed amendments that the gentleman from Wisconsin in general debate gave notice that he was going to offer a number of so-called perfecting amendments. He did not offer them then while he was occupying the floor in general debate, but he did attach them to his remarks, and they are printed in the RECORD of the 22d. I did not know what those amendments were any more than the character of them as perfecting amendments. The next day was an exceedingly busy day, as we all know, in the Committee of the Whole. When the gentleman from Wisconsin arose and offered the amendment which he has discussed, I then made the request that these amendments proposed by him, so far as they affected section 1, should be passed over, with the privilege of returning to the section at any time he might see proper to offer them. There was objection made to that, and an agreement was made that we might return at any time to offer perfecting amendments, without limiting it to the gentleman from Wisconsin. That was agreed to, and immediately the point of no quorum was made, and so no further business was done.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. If that had been agreed to, I would not have offered it this morning.

Mr. SIMS. It remained without being acted upon.

Mr. LENROOT. I am willing to make that agreement now.

Mr. SIMS. I stated to the gentleman from Wisconsin and other Members of the House, not in debate, that I wanted to go over those amendments, and that where an amendment was proper and desirable, to have no controversy about it or to oppose it because the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] or I had not proposed it, but that where it was a perfecting amendment, if it merely affected the verbiage, I thought it was better to accept them than to waste a lot of time in discussing them and voting for or against them. My intention at that time, as I expressed privately to members of the committee, was to give attention to the amendments set out in the RECORD on Sunday and call the committee together at 11 o'clock this morning and submit the proposed amendments to the full committee. That was my intention, so stated to the members of the committee and to Members of the House.

But I will admit that to my surprise when I submitted a unanimous-consent request that the House meet at 11 o'clock to-day it was accepted. Judging by the way such requests have been met before I thought it would be disagreed to. So if I called the committee together it had to be at 10 o'clock. I put in the whole day with the best assistance I could get in analyzing the amendments. I have a memorandum here of that analysis. Some of them I have not the slightest objection to and will offer no argument against them. Others are material in substance, and I think ought to be defeated on their merits or lack of merits.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Why does not the gentleman renew his request as to these amendments to perfect the text, passing over them, and going along with the bill?

Mr. SIMS. I want to state further that I even then would have called the committee together. I made several efforts to get the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] over the telephone, but failed, for the purpose of asking him to communicate with members on his side asking them to meet here this morning, and I would notify the others. I was unable to get him, and that is the reason why the committee was not called together.

There are amendments to section 1, and others go through the entire bill. Consequently, we are bound to reach them to-day, and as these are some of the most important amendments that will be offered we must consider them on their merits as they are reached. When we come to an amendment that I do not expect to oppose there will be no time wasted. There are others, and even on those the members of the committee might differ. I wanted to do this as a courtesy to the committee and give them an opportunity to pass upon them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SIMS. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMS. Here is an amendment offered in all good faith by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. Before he offered to modify it he pronounced it absolutely necessary to carry out the intention of the committee and the House. After making a very strong speech and many positive assertions, he himself admits that he was mistaken as to part of the amendment he had offered, to strike out the words "equivalent as nearly as may be."

Mr. LENROOT. I did that because I thought by accepting the modification it would remove an element of controversy.

Mr. SIMS. And that was the most important element in it. Now that proves that no man is infallible in his knowledge of these things. No man has a higher opinion of the ability of the gentleman from Wisconsin to understand any question that he studies and gives thought to than I have. The head of the committee, so far as the period of service is concerned, another gentleman from Wisconsin, who has served on the committee longer by several years than any other member, who has had every opportunity to study all these amendments and has studied them, and I place to-day and at this minute and at this hour more confidence in the judgment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] on these amendments than I do in the illustrious Senator to be from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. Now, gentlemen may anticipate that I am going to ask them to vote down the amendments and thrash it out in conference. I am not. I am going to ask them to thrash them out right here, and I hope the gentleman from Wisconsin will admit that his amendments are not infallible and necessary to the perfection of the bill.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I think the amendment does not help the bill, but gives the gentleman a lot of wreckage to float on, and I think it ought to be voted down.

Mr. LENROOT. Is that the best argument the gentleman can make?

Mr. SIMS. No; that was not intended to be an argument.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the gentleman not think it would be better for the gentleman to undertake to analyze the bill and show wherein my contention is not correct?

Mr. SIMS. I shall withdraw any complimentary remark I have made about the gentleman if it is offensive.

Mr. LENROOT. It would be to much better purpose if the gentleman did.

Mr. SIMS. I am trying to say that this very item, this very language of the bill, this amendment, in its effect, has been studied and gone over ad libitum by the very best authority that we can consult on what is the purpose of that portion of the section, and what is the intention to permit the President to include in his contract. This identical proposition and all that is embraced in the gentleman's amendment was fully discussed at length by the committee, and so far as this part of the bill is concerned, it is the deliberate judgment of the entire committee.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the gentleman mean to say that his committee discussed these questions I have been discussing and that it is the deliberate opinion of the committee that the language of the bill expresses the intention that they desire?

Mr. SIMS. The committee——

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman has made that statement.

Mr. SIMS. The committee accepted the bill as it is reported, and the minority report makes no objection to any part of it, as no member of the committee has offered any amendment touching this language, and that was discussed in the committee. I can not say it was the deliberate judgment of each member.

Mr. LENROOT. Was this question discussed in the committee?

Mr. SIMS. Yes. Several gentlemen on the committee are right here by me and they tell me that it was discussed at length. Half a dozen of them here say so.

Mr. SNOOK. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I offered the amendment in the committee that the gentleman has offered, in the very words in which the gentleman has offered it, and after discussing it for half an hour the committee agreed to the language contained in the bill.

Mr. LENROOT. Then all I can say is, if the gentleman will yield, that I want to withdraw the statement I made the other day, that I did not think the committee was in any way to blame, except as being victims of misplaced confidence.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask the committee not to make the mistake of following a gentleman who is not on the committee, however great his ability may be, in undertaking to rewrite this bill after this thing has been rejected in the Senate and in the House.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? I would like to have my colleague, Mr. ESCH, discuss this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I have made a very earnest effort to analyze this bill, after having heard the general debate and read what has been said in the Senate. The bill seems to drive at three purposes, and three only, in the main. The first is to fix the amount that the owners of the railroads are to get out of it, the next is to provide the machinery whereby that amount may be reached, and the third is to give the President power to fix the rates, taking it way from the bodies that now have that power. So far as I am able to get out of the bill, and out of what is said about the bill, there is very little else in it.

We have possession of the railroads. Passing this bill has absolutely nothing to do with our taking them over and operating them. We have that power under existing law.

I want to vote for this bill. I have studied it, in the desire to vote for it, but I have studied it with increasing disappointment. The bill from my point of view is a failure. I regret that the Congress is not responding to this great emergency, in passing railroad legislation of greater importance than any ever broached before upon this subject. It is not responding to the situation adequately, and in a manner worthy of its great traditions. It seems to me that the Congress is dealing with this subject with a lack of courage, with a lack of definite purpose, with a lack of a purpose in view that is really worth while.

We are trying to ride two horses. One is private ownership and the other is public ownership, and those who have had charge of the drafting of this bill, of making it a law, seem to be unwilling to choose either of these horses. They are trying to ride them both at the same time, and I believe that the result will be that the bill will prove to be a most ignominious failure.

So far as the first section of the bill is concerned, absolutely the only purpose it can have is to give the railroads more than they are justly entitled to under the Constitution. That is all there is to it. Why do we have to pay them anything? Simply because Article V of the amendments to the Constitution provides that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation. We can not take the railroads without just compensation. We have no right to give more. It will be a violation of our duty to the American people if Congress shall give these railroads more than just compensation for their use. [Applause.] I venture to say that no one will have the boldness to dispute that proposition.

The courts have construed this provision of the Constitution. Its meaning is certain, and known to every lawyer in this body. It does not take an act of Congress to apply it. The question is, What compensation is just? That is all there is to it, and the Congress——

Mr. DEWALT. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I will allow a question.

Mr. DEWALT. I desire to ask the gentleman, if he is dissatisfied with the compensation as outlined in this bill, what does he propose as a just compensation?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I propose that these railroads shall not be allowed a greater return on their investment than other people whose property is taken by the Government. [Applause.]

Mr. DEWALT. That does not answer the question.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I will answer the gentleman if he will just give me time and will answer it in a sentence. I propose that the railroads shall have a reasonable income upon the actual value of their property at the time the Government took it over. That is what I propose. Now, the Constitution of the United States fixes that as the measure. It is the measure that has been fixed by the Supreme Court of the United States in its decisions passing upon the question of what rights these corporations have. The rate must not be confiscatory. That is the limitation that there is on the rate, and whenever we make it more than that, as I say, we are not responding to the duties of this hour. The Constitution of the United States has been frequently construed by the courts and the rule established that property may be taken if the terms of the taking do not violate that provision and become confiscatory.

Now, that is the rule. How are we going to ascertain what is the amount that ought to be paid for this service? We have the authority to take the property now. We need no new law for that purpose. All we have got to do is to apply the rule that is established by the Constitution and Supreme Court in its construction of that provision.

Are the railroads going to be allowed to take more from the National Government than they should in the way of rates? Is it to be said here that the railroads are going to receive from an absolutely certain source—the Government—an income greater than they would be entitled to if the Interstate Commerce Commission was fixing the rate—that they are entitled to charge for the use of their property by private individuals only such return as will give them a reasonable income, yet may charge the Government a greater rate? If so, what is the basis for such difference. Are you going to give the railroads, because the Government is using them, more than you would if private citizens used them? What basis for any such idea can be advanced?

We need machinery, it is true, to establish this amount that ought to be paid to the railroads and I am willing to vote for such machinery. I am willing to provide adequate machinery, but I am unwilling for a single moment to give the railroads more than that to which they are justly entitled. We know what justice is. The Supreme Court has laid out the rules and all we have got to do is to stand up to them.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I know how very popular it is in the minds of a great many Members of Congress, not only on this side of the Capitol but on the other side as well, to proclaim and declaim continually against railroads and corporations. I fully appreciate the fact, too, that it sounds very well back home to have gentlemen say that they are against corporations and railroads receiving enormous amounts of compensation for anything at anytime or anywhere. But that does not change the relation at all. The popularity of a measure or the unpopularity of a measure in the judgment of an honest legislator has nothing to do with the proposition. Now, what is the proposition? I have heard the gentleman who has just spoken say that he demands justice, that he is willing to give justice but he will not give anything in the way of tribute. Very well, let it be so. Now, what is justice? These roads are taken over. That is an accomplished fact. Having been taken over, they must be compensated. That is the law. Now, how shall they be compensated? The gentleman says, "Take over their property and give them a fair income or rental on that." Unfortunately for that proposition, gentlemen of the committee, it is at this time an utter impossibility. Judge Prouty, who is on the valuation committee of railroads, has definitely declared that all the railroads to-day in this country so far as he knows are not able, from the judgment of the valuation committee, assisted by the railroads themselves, to place any definite value upon their operating property and their valuation.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. DEWALT. Certainly, sir.

Mr. GORDON. Is the gentleman's contention that it is necessary to fix the value of this property now of these railroads? Has it got to be done instanter, or can it be deferred, as we have done with other people whose property we have taken, until the real value of this property can be determined?

Mr. DEWALT. I believe, sir, that for the stability of all the stocks and bonds and all the property interests concerned in this country, so far as railroads are concerned, time is of the essence of the contract.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. I will.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Does the gentleman assert that we ought to stabilize these securities at a higher rate than is just to the people?

Mr DEWALT. Certainly not, and I am coming to that in a moment.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Why does the committee take the three-year period instead of the one-year period, as the English did?

Mr. DEWALT. The reason is this: If we took only the one year, 1917, then you would certainly pay them more than under this.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Certainly.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. England took the prewar year of 1914. Why should not we do the same thing?

Mr. DEWALT. They did not take the prewar year of 1914, the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. GORDON. They took 1912.

Mr. DEWALT. They took six months of 1913 and took six months of 1914.

In other words, gentlemen of the committee, it is just this: There are a great many who argue this question who do not know anything about the facts. [Applause.]

Mr. GORDON. And that is a fact. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. One moment. If I was to agree with all the premises which were laid down by the distinguished gentlemen, then I would certainly come to their conclusion; but the trouble is I can not agree with the premises.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I do not wish to get into this controversy any further.

Mr. DEWALT. It is not a controversy; it is a discussion.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman has just said that they could not take a prewar year, and yet he followed that statement by the statement that England took six months in 1913 and six months in 1914, including up to July, 1914, and the war began in August. And, then, they did take one year just before the war, by his own statement. [Applause.]

Mr. DEWALT. That is exactly what I said, only the gentleman did not hear it. The war broke out in 1914.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman can not evade that. That is what he did say.

Mr. DEWALT. This gentleman never evades anything. He always tries to argue from the facts as they are presented; and the fact is that in England they took six months of 1913 and six months of 1914, and they averaged it; and they averaged it in this way, that if the profits of the railroads in 1914 for the first six months were in excess of the profits of 1913, the last six months, they made the average.

Mr. DOREMUS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. I will yield.

Mr. DOREMUS. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] has just asked you why we did not follow the English plan and take a year preceding our entrance into the war.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. DEWALT. I ask for two minutes more, so that I can respond to this query.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent for two minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOREMUS. If we had adopted that plan, would it not be even more favorable to the railroads than the one that is now incorporated in the bill?

Mr. DEWALT. I have already said that. If we had taken last year—1917—that is the most prosperous year any of the railroad companies have known; 1915 was a lean year, bringing in some $683,100,000; and in 1917 over a billion dollars. The consequence was, they took a light year and a fairly prosperous year to determine the sum total and making the average.

Now, as to this question of compensation according to valuation of the property, Judge Prouty, who was on the valuation committee, has declared that there are now only three railroads in this country that have been investigated as to their property valuation, and they have not yet determined the amount of that valuation. And, further, he says that it will take at least three or four years more—I think he said four, but he said three, I am sure. I am referring to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] for the correctness of my statement.

Mr. ESCH. The valuation, as far as the field was concerned, would take until 1920, and it would take a year before they could tabulate their returns.

Mr. DEWALT. So you see the utter impossibility of trying to fix the valuation upon the basis as presented by my friend from Alabama.

Now, this is a clear question of how we shall compensate them for the use of the property that is taken. The value thereof is represented by the earning capacity of that property, and that earning capacity is not determined by the railroad companies; it is not determined by the President; it is determined by the reports submitted to the Interstate Commerce Commission yearly, adopted, revised, and taken by them as a verity, and those sums are fixed and determined by the Interstate Commerce Commission after due investigation.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended two minutes in order to answer a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The value of the use for what time?

Mr. DEWALT. The value of the use at time of taking would be the legal proposition. But in this instance that could not be a fair estimate, because if you were to follow that you would have to take the value of the use in 1917, and that would be disproportionately large.

Mr. RAMSEYER. And you fix three years?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. If you have the right to fix it at 3 years why have you not the right to fix it for 5 years or 10 years?

Mr. DEWALT. Because the contract is about to be entered into. You must hear the rights of both of the contracting parties, and must arrive at an average that will best suit the interests of not only one but both.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Then, in the judgment of the committee, three years is such a period?

Mr. DEWALT. I think so; yes, sir.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Now, if the gentleman was correct in his statement that a period of a year before the war would be unfair, because excessive, why did not the committee have a right to go back and take two years, or three years, at some period when the railroads of the country were not affected by the abnormal conditions of war abroad?

Mr. DEWALT. In answer to that I wish the gentleman had had the privilege of inspecting all the reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission from the year 1902 all the way up to 1914, 1915, 1916, and 1917.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I am asking for information.

Mr. DEWALT. He would then have come to the determination that 1914 was a very lean year, that 1912 was what they called a bad year, and going along the scale from year to year it was determined by the committee from the inspection of those reports that the average was substantially the mean average during the entire time.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Now, why would not 1910, 1911, and 1912 be fair?

Mr. DEWALT. In other words, I have just been informed by one of my colleagues on the committee who has looked over the figures that this was the lowest net return during a period of 18 years for a like period of three years.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Would that be fair to the railroads?

Mr. DEWALT. As long as they have not objected I should think so.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. LENROOT. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman may have two minutes more. He is a member of the committee. I would like to know what objections he has to the amendment I have proposed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] may proceed for two minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DEWALT. As I understand the gentleman's amendment, it is simply a transposition of the words "not exceeding" from the first page to the second page. Whether it changes the portent of the act I am not able to say. This, however, I will say in all candor to the gentleman that during the time of the discussion on this very phrasing in this first section the gentleman to my right, Mr. SNOOK, of Ohio, offered an amendment almost precisely similar in words and terms. That amendment was discussed, and the question came up as to whether these words should not be put in after the word "compensation" and before the word "not"—"an amount not exceeding an annual sum," and it was thought that that did not improve it at all. It did not clarify the situation or make it any stronger. Then the words "from time to time" were included as an amendment, and then the question came up as to the line, "equivalent as nearly as may be to the average annual railway operating income."

Now, I am going to say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that I do not believe the transposition of those words "not exceeding" from the first page to the second page makes one iota of difference in this bill, and, so far as I am concerned, as a member of the committee, I would vote for it.

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to ask the gentleman this question: Does it not change the entire character of the definition of standard returns unless this change is made?

Mr. DEWALT. I do not think it makes one bit of change. Otherwise I would oppose the amendment.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, we should not lose sight of the legal phase of this question. When you take property and take title to it, you must pay the then value of it; but when you take property for the use of it, you must pay the usable value of it during the period you use it.

Now, this bill provides that the President shall have authority to make a contract. If the contract is entered into willingly, the question of whether the price is too much or too little does not affect its legality. If we expect the President to make this contract, we should give the President sufficient latitude to meet the willing mind of the people who own the railroads, and, as I understand it, it has been tentatively discussed with the railroads and it is reasonably expected that the three-year period will be satisfactory to them. Therefore there is some hope that the contract entered into will be made willingly, and therefore legal and satisfactory. If we propose to extend the contract for a specified period of time, and that does not meet the wishes of the people who own the value, and afterwards it is shown that that is not a fair value, then, under the Constitution, the price could not be enforced.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Do I understand the railroads have consented to what shall be a reasonable compensation?

Mr. CALDWELL. I say, as I understand it—and I base my statement on what I have read in the newspapers—the railroads have been offered this three-year basis, and it seems to meet their approval; but I do not know anything about it personally.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS] a question. He made the statement here a moment ago touching this language.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Michigan give his attention to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The gentleman from Michigan is in the Hall over there.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Michigan will pay attention just a moment, I would like to ask him a question to see if I correctly interpret what he said a moment ago with reference to this proposed amendment. The language in line 10, first page, as he understands it, means this: That the roads shall receive compensation not exceeding an "annual sum," which means that they shall receive each year not more than an amount—see the next page, line 2—"equivalent as nearly as may be to" the standard return; that is, certain things further specified show. Now do I understand the gentleman to say that the Government may not want to pay that all in money, and that therefore the words "not exceeding" were left in the bill to limit the amount which might be paid in cash to the roads? Is that it?

Mr. DOREMUS. Either in cash or its equivalent.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Either in cash or its equivalent?

Mr. DOREMUS. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That being so, the gentleman's idea is that the words "not exceeding" where they are express the intent of the committee?

Mr. DOREMUS. Yes; that is correct; whether the stockholders of the roads get their returns in dividends or whether a part of it goes into the maintenance of the system, the equivalent must be the average for the last three years. That is my understanding.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes; that is what I understood the gentleman to say in interpreting this, and therefore there is a difference in the interpretations given to this clause by the gentleman from Michigan and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] who offered the amendment.

Mr. DOREMUS. My offhand view is that the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin as it now stands does not change the meaning of the section. Certainly the idea of the committee is that the returns to these roads, whether it be in cash or whether it be in something else, shall not exceed the equivalent of the average annual return for the last three years.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Then the words "annual sum" mean such payment?

Mr. DOREMUS. The idea is to find the average annual return for a period of three years, and when that is ascertained, if the railroad company makes the contract with the President, that will be the return during the period of the war.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired. All time on this amendment has expired.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. I hope the chairman will be willing to accept this amendment, in the interest of the clearness of the language.

Mr. SIMS. You mean the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]?

Mr. FESS. Yes—shall receive as just compensation an annual sum not to exceed——

Mr. SIMS. I want to say to the gentleman that I understood the gentleman from Wisconsin to say just now that his amendment as now amended would change the whole character of the scheme of the bill?

Mr. LENROOT. No.

Mr. SIMS. What was it?

Mr. LENROOT. It restores it. As the language now reads, the whole scheme of your bill is changed, but if my amendment is adopted it will be preserved.

Mr. SIMS. I differ with the gentleman; but, after all, it is true that the amendment, in the judgment of the committee, neither helps nor hurts, and therefore I do not think we ought to encourage amendments that do not help the proposition. Anybody can offer amendments of that sort, debate them, and take up the time of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. The Chair understands it is all offered as one amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. LENROOT) there were—ayes 63, noes 65.

Mr. LENROOT. I ask for tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. LENROOT and Mr. SIMS.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 84, noes 61.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words of the section.

Mr. SIMS. Would the gentleman like to have more than five minutes?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I would like 15 minutes.

Mr. SIMS. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have 15 minutes. He is a member of the committee who took no time in general debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee, chairman of the committee, asks unanimous consent that his colleague on the committee have 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, railways from their inception have made most important contributions to military operations, but these contributions have never been so prodigious as in the present world war. It may not be too much to affirm that the success of Germany's military machine is due more to her railway system, its complete coordination with her armies, the rapid and almost perfect transportation of men and matériel from center to fronts, and from front to front, than any other single factor in her military plans. I should add that this system was constructed by Germany long before the outbreak of this war, and was perfected almost wholly for military purposes.

England and France, Mr. Chairman, were not so well prepared in transportation; at least their transportation systems were not adapted to military strategy. Their systems were established for commerce and not for war; but the necessities of war have wrought rapid changes in their railways and they have now become adapted to the perfection of military organization.

America's railway system is beyond doubt the greatest and most efficient railway system in the world, containing some 260,000 miles—more by many thousand miles than the entire mileage of England, France, Germany, Italy, and Russia. But our railways were unadapted to efficient military organization and operation.

Mr. Chairman, the American railways at the time of our declaration of war were somewhat run down. The physical properties had deteriorated; there was a great shortage of engines and cars, and no adequate provisions or plans for maintenance, replacements, renewals, terminals, and additions had been made; the loss of some 70,000 men to the Army, and perhaps a larger number to more remunerative civil employments, resulting in the dislocation of labor, were some of the factors that rendered our railways inadequate to meet the needs of war or the commerce incident thereto.

To coordinate and unify the American railways, to make necessary improvements and replacements, and to operate with greater unity and efficiency became the supreme duty of the hour. Perceiving this situation, the President assumed the grave responsibility of taking over the American railway systems as well as transportation by canals and inland waterways. He had no other alternative.

In addition to the paramount military reasons which I have just suggested, namely, the unification of our railways and their adaptation to effective military organization, was an impelling financial consideration. With over seventeen billions of railway securities, and these securities steadily and rapidly shrinking in value, with another great Government liberty loan confronting us, it became imperative to take over the railroads in order to stabilize the security markets of the country and prevent financial disaster. If railroad securities were forced upon the markets of the country, seeking sales at high rates of interest, and in competition with the flotation of Government bonds, then it became urgently necessary to take over the railroads in order to prevent competition and the consequent demoralization of the finances of the country. The President vividly realized this exigency, for in his address to Congress of January 4, 1916, he said:

> One of the strong arguments for assuming the control of the railways at this time is the financial argument.

From every aspect of the problem, no alternative was left the President but to exercise the power granted him by the act of August 29, 1916, and take over the railways of the country.

Mr. Chairman, the right of the President to assume control of the railways for and during the war is indubitable, certainly for the purposes of this bill and of argument in its support. But what shall the President pay for the use of the railways so taken over? The principles controlling the answer to this inquiry are clear and commanding. He must pay a "just compensation" for the use of the property so taken. Our Constitution, voicing the equities of free governments, expressly so declares. But neither the President nor Congress can determine what is "just compensation"; such compensation must be either agreed upon by the President and the railways, or, failing agreement, it must be determined by the courts. So in the absence of agreement the ascertainment of "just compensation" is a juridical function, not a legislative or an executive function.

But litigation should always be avoided, if practicable, and such an avoidance is most important at this time, for should the American railways seek their compensation by resort to the courts the delay and uncertainly incident to this method of ascertainment might result in chaos and ruin. No Member of the Congress should knowingly invite such a result, and to eliminate its dangerous possibility this bill undertakes to authorize the President to make an agreement with the carriers as to the amount of this compensation, which if reached will exclude juridical action.

Mr. Chairman, the principle is plain, but its concrete application is difficult. For how shall we determine the compensation which he may submit as "just compensation"? Congress may empower him to make an offer, but what shall this offer be? Several methods of ascertaining "just compensation" were considered by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Should we authorize the President to offer compensation based upon a return on the fair value of railway property? This method was considered, but insuperable difficulties met us upon the threshold. For what is the value of such properties? I answer that the evidence before the committee of Congress shows beyond doubt that no one knows now and no one can know in time to deal with this question. Judge Prouty, the most eminent authority on this subject, the chairman of the railway valuation committee of the Interstate Commerce Commission, stated before our committee that he did not know this value, that his committee did not know it, that no one now knows it, and that no one will know it for three or four years to come. Notwithstanding that this eminent official and his committee have been investigating this great subject for some three years, with an expenditure of some millions of dollars, the proof was conclusive that no such valuation is determinable now or can be determined within three years. So, of course, the committee of which I am a member was forced to abandon this method of ascertaining compensation. Should we employ such an untrustworthy and elusive method, the obvious result would be to throw the American railways into court, with inevitable chaos at the moment when the safety of our Republic demanded the stability of American securities. No patriotic public servant could contemplate such an unspeakable calamity, a calamity so desired by our enemies.

Should we adopt a method based upon the market value of the stocks and bonds of the American railway systems? This method was considered, but here the question at once arose, What is this market value, and how can it be determined? Manifestly the market value of such securities is too fluctuating and varying to be adopted as a just basis or measurement of compensation. No fair compensation could thus be ascertained, and to employ such a method could only result in forcing the railways into the courts to obtain the remuneration provided by the Constitution. Again, I may affirm that we dare not invite such a calamity.

So, Mr. Chairman, we had to resort to another basis, to another standard, of compensation; and this basis, this standard, was to approximate the principle and practice employed in the condemnation of private property for public use. This method is an old and tried one, and apparently affords the best and most analogous precedent. This method covers the common equities of the problem. It is simply to pay the owner for the use of his property that amount he has been heretofore getting. The bill adopts this method, and we submit it to Congress and to the country as the most simple, expeditious, and just method obtainable under existing circumstances. A more accurate method might be devised, but a more accurate method can not be devised within the time that action must be taken. Time is almost the essence of the whole undertaking, and if we do not act quickly we may as well not act at all. Therefore I submit that if we can approximate substantial justice by this method we will have done our duty.

So, Mr. Chairman, in determining a proper standard of compensation we not only have to consider what the railways have been getting or earning, but the time within which these earnings have been obtained. Earnings is the income derived from operations less the expenses of operation, taxes, and one or two other items. But within what period shall we estimate the income? Shall it be for the year preceding the date of taking over? Manifestly this period may be unjust, because the preceding year may be an abnormal one, the income being either too small or too large. Therefore the committee determined to take the average operating earnings for a period of three years ending June 30, 1917, as a basis of compensation. That is to say, the earnings for the years 1915, 1916, and 1917 divided by 3 would determine the compensation, not exceeding which the President is authorized to negotiate an agreement. The President need not agree upon the maximum average; he may agree upon a less sum, but he can not agree upon a larger amount. The responsibility within these limitations is squarely placed upon the President.

It has been suggested, Mr. Chairman, that we should have taken a longer period than three years for determining the average annual income. I submit that the committee substantially did this. Go back 18 years and take six three-year periods therefrom, and I submit that the difference in the percentage of income for any one of these periods is not sufficient to justify the rejection of the particular three years adopted by your committee.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield? There is a maximum put upon it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. There is.

Mr. FESS. But no minimum.

Mr. MONTAGUE. No minimum.

Mr. FESS. Does the bill contemplate the betterments suggested by Mr. Hill?

Mr. MONTAGUE. It does.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman allow me to say that the pressure of war seems to be very deleterious to-day on rolling stock, and especially locomotives.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is true; and that is one reason why we should expedite this legislation.

I have not the figures at hand for the moment, but I ask the attention of the committee to the operating income of 38 railway systems comprising what is called the eastern district—that is, the territory east of the Mississippi and north of the Ohio—containing more than one-fourth of the actual mileage of the American railways and a far larger proportion of traffic. The net operating income of these 38 roads for 1915 was less than such income for the years 1906, 1907, 1908, 1910, 1911, 1912, and 1913. The return on the investment for June 30, 1915, was 4.34 per cent, less than the return in any of the last 18 years, except for the year 1914. The average net operating income for the eastern system for the three years ending June 30, 1917, was $384,840,150, which in relation to the average investment during the three-year period gives a return thereon of 5.41 per cent, or less than the returns for the years 1902, 1903, 1905, 1906, 1907, 1910, 1916, and 1917. To put the facts in another form, for the three-year period ending June 30, 1902, the average per cent was 5.37; for the three years ending June 30, 1905, 5.51 per cent; for the three years ending June 30, 1908, 5.70 per cent; for the three years ending June 30, 1911, 5.47 per cent; for the three years ending June 30, 1914, 4.68 per cent; and for the three years ending June 30, 1917, 5.41 per cent. Therefore, it is apparent that the rate proposed, so far as it affects the great eastern system of railways, can not be characterized as extravagant. And when we consider that the average rate of returns upon the property investment of all the railways of America is 5.31 per cent, we must conclude that the earnings or compensation provided for in the bill does substantial justice to the roads and the people of America.

I should add, Mr. Chairman, that the proof of the annual returns of the railways of America is to be found in the record and reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission. So the evidence of the returns is supported by record proof, ascertainable by the public, and regarded as of the highest validity by nearly all systems of jurisprudence.

Mr. Chairman, intimately connected with compensation is the income or the revenue from which that compensation is derived. The earnings of railways rest upon rates and fares. Without charges or rates for passengers and freight, there would be no earnings. Rates, therefore, bear a vital relation to the operation and income of railroads.

The President has taken over the railroads, a step only taken once before in the life of the Nation. His action involves tremendous responsibility. He must control and operate the railway systems of our country. The Congress has authorized him to assume this responsibility, and we must of necessity further authorize him to discharge this responsibility. This responsibility can not be fully performed unless the President can control the earnings and expenditures of the railways. To control earnings he must perforce control rates. Otherwise earnings and expenditures may be dislocated; the equilibrium of income and outgo will not be adjusted; finance and operation will not coordinate.

The Senate bill in its last analysis confers upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the rate-making power, but the House bill confers upon the President in the last analysis the rate-making power. Your committee believes that the logic of events, the emergency which precipitated this responsibility upon the President, the military necessities of the hour, and the coordination of administration and finance, all combine to approve of the power which is delegated to the President by the House bill.

The President not only occupies a relation to railways which the chief executive officers of these railways have heretofore held, but he sustains another and higher relation, namely, that of trustee, that of a disinterested representative of the roads and of the people.

Under existing laws the railways may initiate rates and shippers may indirectly bring about a revision of rates, but there may be serious doubt that the President can initiate rates unless we give him the authority provided for in the pending bill.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I will.

Mr. LENROOT. I am glad to hear the gentleman state that the President has not the power to initiate a rate, but do not the President and his advisers claim that without this bill he has the power to initiate and make rates?

Mr. MONTAGUE. By force of law, incident to the powers conferred upon the President in the act authorizing him to take over the railroads, it may be held that if the railroads could initiate rates, the President, standing in their stead, might exercise similar powers. But I think no power of so important a character should rest upon deduction or argument; it should rest upon the specific authorization of the statute. I would rather not rely on logical processes for this power. I would rather give him that power directly or withhold it directly.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. In case the authority to fix rates is taken from the President in this act, who would then have the right, if this bill becomes a law, without other amendment, to initiate rates?

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is a serious and an embarrassing question and one I do not think any one can answer absolutely. The shipper may have the right indirectly to initiate rates, as I have before suggested, or the board of directors or administrative officers of the roads may possess it. But if the Sweet amendment to the pending bill is adopted then it may be that no one can initiate rates. For it must be borne in mind that the Interstate Commerce Commission can not initiate rates; this commission passes upon the reasonableness of rates submitted to it.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes; for a question.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. If we are only taking over the roads because of military necessity and the transportation of our own war stuff is all that we want, why should we have any concern about commercial rates and commercial business?

Mr. MONTAGUE. There may be occasions when it will be essential for the President to make rates. This bill does not command the President to make rates. It simply gives him this power, and it is a power which from the nature of the case, from the necessities of his office, I imagine he will only use should grave emergencies arise.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I yield.

Mr. MADDEN. Under what circumstances might such a condition arise as the gentleman has just described?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Suppose the President found that a rate upon a given commodity was of such a character that he could not move or retard it with the celerity demanded by the necessities of the case?

Mr. MADDEN. But would that make any difference to the expedition?

Mr. MONTAGUE. It would make a great deal of difference. The existing rates might be such that he could not mobilize or retard the shipment unless he could change this rate, and change it immediately. It might be necessary to discourage shipments, and why should they not be discouraged by rates or classifications? England has done so.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman permit me to suggest that if the President can commandeer the physical properties of the roads, he can put them into operation to carry goods, can he not?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes; but we should give him the indirect authority resulting from rates as well as the direct authority resulting from control over operations.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Regardless of rates?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Above the mere question of commandeering, suppose there is a falling in the revenue which must be averted immediately or operations become impaired and default be made in the guaranty of compensation? Immediate action may be required, and delay incident to the investigation and deliberation of the commission will be fatal. But are we not conjuring up apprehensions? Do we not know that the President will, from the necessities of the case, leave the rate-making duty to the commission; that it will continue as heretofore to pass upon rates; and that the President will only act in a supreme exigency?

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes.

Mr. FESS. If the bill becomes a law, with the power given to the President, is there any possibility of a State railway commission interfering with the rates on an intrastate line?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think that the President's power would be paramount in that respect.

Mr. MADDEN. Has not the commission the power?

Mr. MONTAGUE. He is speaking of intrastate as distinguished from interstate rates.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; but I do not think intrastate shipments would have anything to do with the conduct of the war.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The gentleman was asking whether the President could overrule the public utility commissions of the several States in the exercise of their existing jurisdiction over intrastate rates. I think under the bill, as it now stands, the President will have this power—a power, however, which he is most unlikely ever to exercise.

Mr. DILL. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman leaves that, if the President guarantees a certain remuneration to these roads, and the earnings do not equal the guaranty, how will the money be raised to meet the guaranty?

Mr. MONTAGUE. By an increase of rates.

Mr. DILL. But if the money has not been raised at the end of the year?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Then he could go into the markets and borrow, and the debt thus created would have to be taken care of by increased income which in all human probabilities would have to be taken care of in turn by an increase in rates.

Mr. Chairman, the term of duration of Federal control is inherently connected with compensation and rates. Compensation for a fixed term must be different from compensation for an unlimited term. Congress would hardly authorize the President to tender the same compensation for a brief period as for an indefinite period. Therefore compensation and time are correlative factors. So while less logically connected with rate making still not less practically connected therewith is the duration of control or use of the railways. For it is obvious that Congress would not think it wise or expendient to confer the power of rate making upon the President for an indefinite time, but might think it very necessary to confer such power for the period of the war. Consequently from almost every aspect of the subject the duration of control is an inevitable and vital consideration.

Mr. Chairman, I submit as incontrovertible that if the railways are taken over by the Government for war purposes they should be relinquished upon the conclusion of the war. The end having been accomplished, the peace status should be restored. We should not exert a war power in time of peace, for it would be indefensible in law and in morals.

Mr. Chairman, it has been contended upon this floor that many complications will result from governmental control which must be readjusted at the end of the war, and therefore no definite period should be fixed at this time for such readjustment. But why should a definite date impair such readjustment? Is it not obvious that if a definite time be now fixed all contracts and engagements made between the Government and the railways, or between the Government and third parties in respect of railways, will be made and entered into with relation to such a date, and thereby such complications will necessarily be diminished and readjustments will be facilitated? A definite date inexorably provides in advance against complications, for in the very nature of things the business world will adjust itself to a definite date; the business world can not adjust itself to an indefinite date. An uncertain time for the ending of control, I submit, will necessarily beget confusion, doubts, and complications.

Mr. Chairman, it has also been argued or prophesied that at the end of the war new and strange economic and industrial forces will have come into existence. That from the weltering aftermath of the war colossal economic forces will spring forth, needing to be controlled by a government of ordered liberty. But if these forces are to develop, why should we not now undertake to provide that they shall be dealt with without prejudice by a subsequent Congress, for it is obvious that this Congress will have no opportunity to deal with the subject? Moreover, Mr. Chairman, if these new economic forces are to be controlled, a definite date will prepare and quicken the country for the consideration of this subject.

Therefore I submit that the provision in the pending bill for the termination of control within two years after the war—a generously reasonable duration—is wise in that it puts the country and the Congress upon notice that readjustments will have to be made at the expiration of this period, and therefore a proper stimulus will be given to Congress for the preparatory study and consideration of the questions involved. Without some such notice, some such stimulus, consideration might be postponed under an indefinite prolongation authorized by law until an hour of peril had come upon the country, when time and conditions would forbid that investigation and thought required for the disposition of so great a subject.

Mr. Chairman, it was argued before the committee reporting this bill to the House that a definite time for the return of the railways to their owners would so stimulate speculation in railway securities that chaos would come upon the country. This is a strange and unfounded apprehension. It is self-evident that a contrary result would follow, for uncertainties and contingencies constitute the very life and essence of speculation.

Mr. Chairman, recurring to a former thought suggested by me, I would urge that whatever difficulties and problems may result from this war, no legislation now enacted should give a tendency or an inertia to any given remedy or theory that may hereafter have to be considered. This is no time to place weights upon future Congresses. This is a period of strain and stress; the unnatural and the abnormal prevail. Let us await peace for a consideration of ownership or increased regulation of railways. Congress will not then be disconcerted by the hysteria of war; free from its perturbations and under normal conditions Congress can then wisely deal with all of these questions.

Mr. Chairman, we should not throw away our chart. We should not forget the consideration which moved the passage of the act of August, 1916, for Federal control. That consideration was one and only one, namely, to meet the exigencies and necessities of war. The commerce clause of the Constitution—was wholly unrelated to the motive or purpose of the legislative mind. To contend that the railways may be taken over under the war power, but held after the war under the commerce clause of the Constitution is a contradiction and a piece of legislative legerdemain to which I can not give my consent.

I submit as a matter of supreme moment that Congress should employ no war power for peace purposes; that it should not pervert the exigencies of war to experimental peace policies in advance of the arrival of peace. When we assert the war powers of the Constitution our action should rest upon those powers. We should not in one breath declare our action based upon war, and in the next that the same action is based upon commerce. For it should never appear to those of coming generations that the legislative department of the Government ever for an instant considered the Constitution of our Republic a "scrap of paper." [Applause.]

It does not seem unpopular, I fear, to consider the Constitution a negligible document. I differ from that view. I entertain with deep conviction that a country of the size of America, with its millions of people, with varying economic interests and social aspirations, can foresee the end of its career, unless its political institutions are defined and protected by a written constitution. [Applause.]

Gladstone is reported to have said that the American Constitution was the greatest instrument ever struck off by the brain and purpose of man at any one time. This is perhaps an exaggerated truth, for the American Constitution is really an evolutionary document, formulating for the time at least the accumulated liberties and social aspirations of a mighty people.

The war determines our duty. The war inexorably fixes a date for the return of the properties of the American railways. We have no moral or legal right to hold this property after the end of the war save for a reasonable time, which is a judicial question, and within which the readjustments incident to relinquishment may be effected.

Let our successors deal with the questions presenting themselves after the close of the war. They can then be considered from every angle, and the Congress can bring to bear upon these conclusions its profoundest research, assembling all data, assessing all facts, and solving them with courage and wisdom. I take counsel in my faith in the institutions of my country rather than in the voices of the excited prophets of the unknown. [Applause.]

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment. On page 2, line 7, after the word "seventeen," insert the words "both inclusive."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 7, after the word "seventeen," insert the words "both inclusive."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. I do.

Mr. WALSH. This question may have been brought out before, but I wanted to ask the gentleman his idea as to the meaning of this language in parenthesis, whether that means they can only include income of lines that have been acquired, leased, or consolidated within those three years, or whether it simply means the incomes of the roads for those three years, no matter when they might have been acquired, leased, or consolidated. From a reading of it it would appear that it was confined to the income of lines acquired, leased, or consolidated within that period of three years. Now, there are a great number of roads that were leased prior to July 1, 1914.

Mr. ESCH. They will be taken care of under the three-year period, but it was because of a doubt whether the income should be increased by the money derived by the lines leased for that period of time or included, namely, within the period of six months.

Mr. WALSH. That is not the six months' period.

Mr. ESCH. I should say the three-year period, which is taken as the period for the standard return.

Mr. WALSH. Well, I can not quite understand why it is necessary to put those two dates in there as applying to leased lines.

Mr. ESCH. As being a source of income to the carriers it should be included in the standard return. If it were not put in there they would be denied that amount of standard return, and they would be entitled to it under the principles enunciated in section 1.

Mr. WALSH. But suppose a road was acquired on June 1, 1914. Then that income could not be included.

Mr. ESCH. Without this specification it would be included, and the only purpose of my amendment is to include both——

Mr. WALSH. I understand the object of the gentleman's amendment, but it seems to me that the phraseology as employed confines the rates to include the income of leased lines to those lines that were leased between those two dates.

Mr. ESCH. Yes; that is the statement of it. What would be prior to that time would already be reflected in the operating income of the carriers.

Mr. WALSH. But if you left the two dates out and left the words in parentheses out, would it not also be included?

Mr. ESCH. I think it would not.

Mr. SIMS. I want to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin a question. As I caught his amendment, after the word "seventeen," it provides for using the words "both inclusive"?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. That covers a period of more than two years.

Mr. ESCH. We fix a limit between July 1 and December 31. Now, ordinarily you either include the first date and exclude the last or exclude the first and include the last. But we want both.

Mr. SIMS. The word "both" means it is between the two dates?

Mr. ESCH. But you include the two dates.

Mr. SIMS. I thought the word "inclusive" was sufficient without the word "both," but I have no objection to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. On page 12, line 17, after the word "retirements," insert a comma.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is advised that it has already been done by a previous amendment.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. On page 1, line 9, after the words "receive," insert "out of the earnings thereof."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BORLAND: Page 1, line 9, after the word "receive," insert the words "out of the earnings thereof."

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment for the purpose of calling the committee's attention to what I understood to be the statement of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE], not because I favor this particular plan that this amendment would provide. The operation of this amendment would be to provide for the payment of compensation only out of the earnings of the road. As the bill now stands I think it provides for an absolute payment of compensation according to the agreement between the President and the roads.

Now, I agree with the original text of the bill, but my understanding of the question asked by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE], and answered by him, was that if the roads did not make sufficient earnings they would be compelled to make sufficient earnings by the adjustment of rates. I may not have understood the gentleman from Virginia correctly, but that is my recollection of his answer.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. I understand the suggestion made by the gentleman from Virginia, in discussing the rate-making power given to the President, was that if the expenses of the road were increased somebody should have the power to raise the revenue sufficiently to cover those extensions.

Mr. BORLAND. There is no question about that. But he said the question was asked him as to where the money was to come from to pay this compensation, and he said "out of the rates," and if the rates were not sufficient they must be made sufficient.

Now, my understanding is that the compensation the railroads are to receive is absolute and without any regard whatever to the success or nonsuccess of the roads; and, believing that is true, I am in favor of the text of the committee bill, both on this point and on the point of the President having the power to make rates.

Mr. MEEKER. Does it not seem like a good business policy to make the rate high enough so as to pay expenses?

Mr. BORLAND. Exactly. I am in favor of the power of the President to initiate rates as provided in the text of this bill, because I believe that this compensation to the railroads is payable absolutely; and I further believe, in common with these two gentlemen who have interrogated me, that if the returns of the road are not sufficient to pay the compensation, and they can be made sufficient by a readjustment of the rates within fair lines of business, they should be made sufficient by a fair adjustment of the rates.

Mr. SWITZER. Suppose whoever had control—say, the Director General—would so divert the freight for military purposes as to decrease materially the earnings of the railroad system, do you think that railroad should then receive compensation because it has not earned enough money to pay the standard rate?

Mr. BORLAND. If the gentleman thinks I do, he has misunderstood what I said before. I do not think we can escape the payment of the compensation.

Mr. SWITZER. You say it should be out of the earnings of the road?

Mr. BORLAND. It should be; but, as a matter of legal effect, it is not.

Mr. SWITZER. But suppose the Director General diverts the freight from that system which would naturally come over it, and it has not the earning capacity that it had before, would he still stand sponsor?

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman and I are not apart on that. It may be that the effect of the war will be to blight certain industries or certain shipments from certain communities or the movement of freight in certain directions so as to cut down tonnage of certain railroads. That might be the effect of the war, irrespective of the diversion for war purposes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Under this bill there are two different classes of roads. One class is those roads which have had a standard return, which means a net income for a three-year period. The President could not pay more than that income for that period.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARKLEY. There are other roads that the President has taken over which have no standard return for that period, because they have made no operating income. Now, if the gentleman's amendment is adopted, the President can not make a contract or pay operating expenses except out of the income, and he would be barred from making a contract with these roads that have no standard return.

Mr. BORLAND. I thought I made it clear that I did not want to change the language of the bill. There is only one further point I want to make.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman, then, does not expect to insist on his amendment?

Mr. BORLAND. Oh, no. I wanted to call attention to that. The question is a very vital one as to the right of the President to initiate rates, as are the reasons which have been urged by some gentlemen why no such power should be given. I am one of those who agree with the member of the committee from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] that the President has that power now by virtue of the act of last August.

When he assumed management and control of the roads, I believe he stepped into the shoes of the managers of those roads, and he has as much power to make rates on the roads he controls as he has control of the train service of those roads; just exactly the same power. He steps into the shoes of the managers of the roads, and he or his subordinate official becomes the man who initiates the rates. The only question in doubt is what becomes of those rates after they are initiated? Do they come before the Interstate Commerce Commission, and are they suspended for 30 days? That is the only question involved.

My understanding of this bill is that it gives the President the power to put into effect a change of rates immediately, and gives the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to review those rates upon the complaint of any shipper. It may be an extension of the President's power, because now he might be simply in the position of the manager of the road to initiate rates, as the manager would, and they would be under the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission, as now. But, as the President has the absolute war power to control these roads, what remedy would the shipper have if the President should put the rates immediately into force? So, as a practical proposition, there is no difference in the legal status of the shipper. We might just as well in this bill give the shipper full knowledge of what his rights are going to be. I believe that the committee, in drafting this bill, has given the shipper as full an opportunity for a hearing on the fairness of rates as can be given under the law. I believe that all the shipper can get any way is to have the right to have the findings of the President reviewed by the Interstate Commerce Commission. I do not believe that the shipper can get under the law an absolute suspension of those rates, nor do I believe he can get any new remedy in case the rates are determined to be unfair or discriminatory. We must trust the President with the war power, and the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has very wisely, I think, provided for the use of the machinery of the Interstate Commerce Commission to review the fairness of those rates, so that the shipper may have some opportunity at least to present his side of the case, which may not have been presented to the Director General of the road at the time the rate was first initiated.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. FOSS. I want to ask the gentleman whether or not he thinks the Interstate Commerce Commission might have some diffidence in passing upon a rate fixed by the President of the United States, who is the creator, so to speak, of the men who occupy positions on that commission?

Mr. BORLAND. I do not think so. I do not think the Interstate Commerce Commission, if the gentleman were a member of that commission—and in that case I feel sure he would make a distinguished member of the commission—and if I were also a member I do not think we would have the slightest hesitation in passing upon such rates as might be fixed by the President.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. BORLAND. I say I do not think the gentleman from Illinois or I would have the slightest hesitation in pronouncing upon all questions affecting the rights of the people of the United States, not the slightest.

Mr. FOSS. Now, as I understand it, this commission reports back to the President, so that the President reviews, so to speak, the proceedings of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. BORLAND. It is purely advisory as to him.

Mr. FOSS. That is to say, the President can initiate the rates, but the commission has appellate jurisdiction in a way; but the President is the final arbiter?

Mr. BORLAND. Unquestionably; and I am unable to see how under the law it can be otherwise. If I have correctly read the case of Marbury against Madison, I do not think the President of the United States can be either mandamused or enjoined. I do not see that any other remedy can be given to the shipper than the one we have given him.

Mr. FOSS. But here the Interstate Commerce Commission, that formerly fixed the rates, is practically put into a state of "innocuous desuetude."

Mr. BORLAND. I do not think so.

Mr. FOSS. The commission has not the power to fix the rates.

Mr. BORLAND. It has not the power now to fix the rates, but review rates.

Mr. FOSS. It reports to the President.

Mr. BORLAND. I think it is now a valuable power and worthy of preserving that gives them the right to review rates. The shipper may show an entire difference of view regarding those rates, and they may be either restored or modified or otherwise changed as the result of a fair hearing. I think that is all that can be fairly given to the shipper.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman say that the Interstate Commerce Commission has not now the power to initiate rates?

Mr. BORLAND. It decides on the reasonableness of those rates.

Mr. MADDEN. But they can not be put in effect until the final judgment of the commission is given.

Mr. BORLAND. On the question of reasonableness.

Mr. MADDEN. On the question of rates.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has again expired.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I wonder if we can not enter into a unanimous-consent agreement about limiting the time of debate on this section?

Mr. TOWNER. I will say, Mr. Chairman, that I have an amendment that I want to offer as a substitute for the first paragraph of this section. I have been waiting, of course, until those amendments were disposed of that perfected that first part of the section. I have no objection, so far as I am personally concerned, to the limitation of the debate, but I would like to have that taken into consideration.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not want to cut off any opportunity for offering amendments, but the time seems to be running on unlimitedly. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the debate on this section and all amendments thereto be concluded in 20 minutes.

Mr. TOWNER. I would like to have 10 minutes on my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] asks unanimous consent that all debate on the section and all amendments thereto be concluded in 20 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I shall have to object to that, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MADDEN. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman object to 45 minutes?

Mr. BORLAND. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARKLEY. I want to renew my request for unanimous consent, and make it 45 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be concluded in 45 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I object.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, will not the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. I want to say that half of the time this morning was consumed in general debate and not on amendments. I want to suggest to the gentleman that if he desires to push the bill speedily he can make a point of order, but we ought to have reasonable time for amendments.

Mr. BARKLEY. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] was allowed to proceed.

Mr. LENROOT. I do not think we should cut off amendments.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have no desire to limit amendments.

Mr. MADDEN. I reserve the right to object. There are a great many Members who would be glad to discuss the bill in its general phases in general debate, but they did not have the opportunity to do so, and it may be that they will want to discuss the bill out of order and not the amendments that may be pending. I think they ought to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard. Does any gentleman desire to offer an amendment?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CONNALLY of Texas: On page 3, line 1, after the word "carrier," insert the words "and in the discretion of the commission from such other evidence and data as may be available to or secured by the Interstate Commerce Commission."

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it will be noted that in this paragraph it is provided that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall determine from the books, reports, and other data of the carriers both the standard return and the cost of any improvements and extensions; and in the next sentence it provides that its certificate as to these facts shall be conclusive. My amendment seeks to give the commission the discretion, either to confine itself to the character of data or evidence already mentioned in the bill, or to go outside and to take into consideration other evidence or data which it may be able to secure. Now, it does seem to me that it is rather giving too much weight to the evidence which the carriers may submit, to confine the Interstate Commerce Commission to that evidence, and then to make a finding based on that evidence absolutely conclusive. My amendment will only give the commission the discretion which I think it ought to possess, to ascertain the truth wherever it may find it, whether from the books or records of the carriers themselves, or from the books and records of other carriers with whom they may have had dealings, or from the books and records of trust companies and financial institutions with which the carriers may have had business connections, and which may be able to throw some light upon the financial operations of the railway companies mentioned. I believe this amendment ought to be adopted in all fairness to the shipping public, because unless it is adopted, and if the language in the bill is retained it will absolutely tie the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and say to it that in trying the case they shall be confined to the evidence offered by the plaintiff, and shall in the good old justice-of-the-peace way enter up judgment for the plaintiff.

Mr. ESCH. Would it satisfy the objection the gentleman has raised to strike out from the bill the words "and from reports, books, and other pertinent data of such carriers," leaving the commission the whole field of inquiry?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Absolutely.

Mr. ESCH. So that would make the gentleman's amendment unnecessary.

Mr. SIMS. If the gentleman will confine his amendment to that, there will be no objection to it.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I will accept the amendment.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman can ask to modify his amendment.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment and to offer the following instead.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CONNALLY of Texas: Page 2, line 24, to page 3, line 1, strike out the words "from the reports, books, and other pertinent data of such carrier."

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the amendment. At this time I want to discuss briefly the proposition referred to by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] to the effect that the Interstate Commerce Commission is a creature of the President, and that therefore in the existing emergency it should be shorn of its power to be the final arbiter of the rates. I think that there can be but little question as to the wisdom of the step which the President took on December 28 when he issued his proclamation taking over the railroads, and I think that there are but few, very few, in this country who are not in entire sympathy with what has been done in this respect and are willing to cooperate in every possible way toward making the operation of these railroads by the President a success and an agency for promoting greater efficiency in the prosecution of the war; but the inquiry at once arises, Is it necessary to discard the machinery of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which has hitherto exercised its jurisdiction under the laws enacted by Congress, in order that this successful operation shall be obtained? The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] advanced the novel proposition that the Interstate Commerce Commission is the creature of the President, and that therefore to permit it to be the judge as to rates would be making the creature greater than the creator. Gentlemen, the Interstate Commerce Commission is not the creature of the President. It is an independent body, created by an act of Congress of the United States. Its members are appointed, it is true, by the President, just as he appoints the members of the Supreme Court. But would any Member of this House have the temerity to say that the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court ought to be taken away, even in time of war, because, forsooth, it has the power to interpret the laws and the Constitution of the United States and to which interpretation the President of the United States, Members of Congress, and all other public officials and private citizens must conform their actions? Now, I am in favor of that provision of the bill which gives the President the power to initiate rates, but I believe that the final arbiter of the reasonableness and justice of those rates should be the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. REAVIS. No one who understands the tremendous amount of labor now devolving upon the President would expect him to fix rates.

Mr. BLACK. No one would expect him to do it. I take it that in the midst of his large and expanding duties it would be impossible for him to go into the intricate study of railway fares and rates.

Mr. REAVIS. He would have to do it through some commission.

Mr. BLACK. He would; and who is better qualified to deal with rate matters than the Interstate Commerce Commission, which by reason of its long experience possesses a better knowledge of these intricate matters of freight rates than any other body in this country? It is learned in the complicated and complex matters inseparably connected with transportation problems as is probably no other body of men in the country.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield for another question in line with his argument?

Mr. BLACK. Yes; I yield.

Mr. REAVIS. The foundation of these rates must be reasonableness. Who has had experience as to the reasonableness of rates to compare with the experience of the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. BLACK. No one that I know of, and I think that it should continue to exercise its authority over fares and rates, under legal authority and restraints which are already a part of the law of the land.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman said he was in favor of the President initiating rates, as I understood him?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. But would the gentleman have the rates initiated go into effect immediately?

Mr. BLACK. I myself will propose an amendment, if it is not proposed by some member of the committee, that will leave the law with respect to initiating rates substantially as it now is, except that I would give the President the right to initiate rates without giving the notice now provided by law, but leave that matter to the discretion of the President. Then I would allow the shipper to appeal to the Interstate Commerce Commission, if he wishes to do so, and let that body finally determine whether or not such rates, fares, charges, classifications, and so forth, are just, fair, and reasonable.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman, then, wants to put the President exactly in the attitude that the railroads were before the war with reference to the initiation of rates?

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman substantially states my position, but not exactly so.

Mr. SIMS. That he may initiate in the sense of merely proposing an increase?

Mr. BLACK. He may initiate rates and put them into effect under the provisions of the pending bill, and I favor that; and what I want to do is to give the same right of appeal to the Interstate Commerce Commission as is now provided by law.

Mr. SIMS. The law does not provide now for putting a rate into effect.

Mr. BLACK. It does upon 30 days' notice, or such notice as the Interstate Commerce Commission may prescribe.

Mr. SIMS. The Interstate Commerce Commission must approve now before they permit it to be filed.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman states the law correctly, as applied to carriers, if my memory serves me right, but I favor the provision that you have in the bill which we are now considering, giving the President the right to initiate fares and rates, which is undoubtedly some modification over the present law; but while I am in favor of that provision, so as to give the President the power of quick action, still I also want to preserve the right to the shipper to appeal to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and leave that commission with full power to be the final arbiter as to the justness and fairness of rates, and power to suspend them if they are found to be not just and reasonable.

Mr. SIMS. One of the largest shippers would be the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. RAYBURN. Is not the idea of the gentleman from Texas along the line of the amendment that I proposed in the committee and presented here, that the President should be given the power to initiate the rate and that it shall go into effect in 30 days unless complaint is filed?

Mr. BLACK. Yes; but I would go further than that and allow these rates to go into immediate effect, but allow the Interstate Commerce Commission to suspend them if they were found to be unjust and unreasonable. Now, we all know that in the operation of the transportation companies the President can not act very generally by personal direction, but that it will be done largely by the Director General, and it is very apparent that even he, with his many pressing duties connected with the Treasury Department and the direction of the great financial operations of the war, will be forced to delegate his authority to subordinates; and therefore it seems to me that the reasonable and logical thing to do is to make the Interstate Commerce Commission the final judge in these matters, for the very simple reason that it is the most efficient and the most effective body in this country to deal with such matters, and it is not reasonable to suppose that any other body appointed by the President or the Director General would be more competent to deal with the problem.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Does the gentleman think that the shipper ought to be required to pay more than a fair and just rate in order to make up the deficit which might be caused by the necessities of war?

Mr. BLACK. He should not; it ought to be levied by general taxation if there should happen to be any deficit. I hope, of course, that there will be none. Now, why should we want to destroy the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission and lodge these unnecessary powers in the hands of the President? Is it merely for the sake of granting autocratic powers to the President? Surely not. I have never understood that the President wants Congress to grant him any powers which he does not need in the prosecution of the war, and surely no one can contend that the power to be the final judge of rates is a war power.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the provision inserted in the bill that prohibits everybody, the President included, from imposing any more than a just and reasonable rate.

Mr. BLACK. That is true; but who is to determine it? Why not a judicial body like the Interstate Commerce Commission? It is not an administrative body. It is more in the nature of a judicial body, with power to adjust equities between the shipper and the carrier. It does not operate the railroads. It does not initiate rates. It irons out the differences which are bound to arise in the operation of the roads whether that operation shall be by the railroads or by a Director General appointed by the President of the United States.

Mr. SNOOK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. I will.

Mr. SNOOK. Did I understand the gentleman to say that if it should become necessary during the period of Government control of the railroads to raise the rates, or a rate, that he favors taxation of the people to pay it?

Mr. BLACK. I say that if a deficit should arise in the operation of the railroads, due to war necessities, that the shipper should not be penalized thereby to the point where he would have to pay an unjust and an unfair rate; that he ought to have some tribunal to appeal to, to decide as to the justness and reasonableness of rates.

Mr. SNOOK. I understood the gentleman to say, in answer to his colleague from Texas, that if it was necessary to raise the rate he favored the raising of that higher rate by taxation.

Mr. BLACK. If the gentleman understood me that way, he understood me erroneously. What I said was that rather than that the shipper should at any time be required to pay an unjust, unreasonable, and confiscatory rate, taxes ought to be levied in the usual way rather than to penalize him.

I think that is a sound proposition and that most of us agree on that, at least. I hope that at the proper place in the bill that an amendment will be adopted preserving the ordinary and usual jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. MADDEN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois will be recognized in opposition to the motion of the gentleman from Texas, and then all debate will be closed.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, the Interstate Commerce Commission is not the creature of the President. It is an independent department of the Government. It is so held to be an independent department. It is not subject to the orders of the President and ought not to be subject to his orders. Under the present law regulating rates the carrier is allowed to suggest a rate, and he files that rate with the Interstate Commerce Commission. He can not file the rate at all until the Interstate Commerce Commission says so within the period of 30 days. It is within the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission to suspend the rate after it is filed for another period, and it is finally within the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission to say what the rate shall be.

Now, I submit that if the Interstate Commerce Commission is not to be allowed to carry out the functions for which it was organized it ought not to be kept as a burden upon the taxpayers of the country. It is costing a good many million dollars every year to maintain the Interstate Commerce Commission. By long years of training it has acquired experience in rate making. Who will say that the President of the United States has had any such experience as will qualify him to make rates, and why should he be permitted to make the rates? Why should the Interstate Commerce Commission be compelled by any legislation that we may enact to simply review the rate made by the President of the United States and submit the result of their view to him for his action? The mere fact that we have turned over to the President of the United States the power to operate the railroads for the period of the war, as a war measure, does not justify the granting of further power of making rates. One of the functions of operating this railroad is a war function and the other function proposed in this legislation is a commercial activity. Nobody will suffer if the President is put in the place of the railroad companies and is authorized in that capacity to suggest rates to the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Interstate Commerce Commission is authorized, as they now are, to say whether those rates are reasonable and just. The President, simply because he happens to be President, ought not to be given unlimited powers to make rates. He might decide to raise the rates out of all reason, and yet these rates might be considered as reasonable by the Interstate Commerce Commission, because they would not want to have their opinion conflict with his.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. In a moment; but even the suggestion of the Interstate Commerce Commission after review would not be binding upon the President, and so whether he made a reasonable or an unreasonable rate would make no difference. I yield now.

Mr. TOWNER. I want to make this suggestion to the gentleman: Under the old law, up until the time we took over the regulation of the railroads, the question of rate making was a question between the railroads and the people, and then we said that neither the railroads nor the people should have the right arbitrarily to decide, and we instituted the Interstate Commerce Commission as a board for that purpose. The question of rate making is now one between the people and the Government, and yet it is said here that one of the parties to that relationship, the Government itself, the President of the United States, is to have the right to make the rates.

Mr. MADDEN. And I do not think it ought to be so, because the President in the performance of his function as the operator of the railroads is representing the individual owners of the railroads, though he may be speaking for the Government, and he should not be permitted to arbitrarily fix a rate without the right of review and decision from some other body, and that body should be the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired. All time has expired on this amendment. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a statement for the benefit of the committee. The question of rate making or the power of rate making will be reached in this bill at the proper place. Of course, there is going to be time for liberal debate when it is reached, and from now on I shall object to discussing the rate-making question under an amendment that does not apply to it at all. I understand when the question is reached that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] is going to offer an amendment.

Mr. ESCH. It will be offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET].

Mr. SIMS. At all events, it will be offered when we reach that part of the bill, and I shall object to further discussion of the question of rate making.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Members of the gentleman's own committee were discussing this question?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. And the other Members who were not familiar with the practice of the committee and its members had a right to believe that it was in order, so long as the committee itself inaugurated the practice.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. RAMSEYER moves to amend section 1 by adding the following paragraph——

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, section 1 has been already amended by an amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH]. I suppose this amendment ought to come in at the end of that amendment which has been already adopted.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I hope it will come in at some place.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment as a new paragraph, and at what point of the bill?

Mr. RAMSEYER. I place it at the end of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH].

Mr. ESCH. At the bottom of page 5.

The CHAIRMAN. It is to come in at the end of the section?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. RAMSEYER moves to amend section 1 by adding the following paragraph at the end of the section:

"Provided, That in no case shall the net income (that is, the sum remaining after deducting for operation, maintenance, taxes, fixed charges, and interest in funded and unfunded debts, and all other items of expense according to the system of accounting established by the Interstate Commerce Commission) of such carrier exceed 6 per cent on the par value of the capital stock (eliminating duplications) outstanding on the 31st day of December, 1917."

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, a year ago when our entrance into this war seemed inevitable, and for the first few months after war was formally declared, much was said by men in and out of public office about this being a war without profiteering; that no one should make money out of war; that all must sacrifice. Most of the people are now sacrificing, most of the people are bearing greater burdens, and most of the people are receiving no special legislative favors from this body.

Nearly 10 months ago I made a speech on the floor of this House in which I took occasion to say:

We must take the people into our confidence and constantly reassure them by our legislative acts—not words merely—of our righteous purposes in this war. * * * While considering measures to bring this war to a successful and just termination we must not overlook those problems that touch every man, woman, and child in the land and the just and equitable solution of which will vitally affect our national concord and unity. If the laws that we shall pass here will permit some to amass vast wealth out of this war and cast the burdens and sacrifices upon the shoulders of the masses of our population it will require no prophet to tell you that that will tend to discord and dissension. * * * What I am contending for in these times is laws so just and equitable that no class of our citizens will have occasion to feel that they are not getting a fair and square deal and for a foreign policy worthy of our traditions and of our boasted leadership among the democracies of the world.

These principles have guided me and shall continue to guide me during the remainder of my service in this body. With these principles in mind, let us examine the bill before the House.

The bill is not a proposition to take over the railroads. The railroads have been taken over by the President under provisions of the act of August 16, 1916. The roads are now in the possession of and under the control of the Government and they will remain in the possession of and under the control of the Government during the war, whether this bill becomes law or not. I voted for the law of August 16, 1916, and I approve the President's action in taking over the railroads. I know of no one in Congress who either opposed the law that gave the President power to take over the railroads in such an emergency as this or who is now opposed to the Federal Government operating the roads during the present emergency.

In view of what I have said it is evident that Members of Congress can freely express their views in opposition to provisions of the bill or the bill itself without fear of being understood as opposing the action of the President in taking over and operating the railroads. Whether the sections of the bill relative to the compensation of the owners of the railroad stock or the powers to be granted to the Interstate Commerce Commission or the time limit when the railroads shall revert back to their owners become law or are amended to conform to views held by gentlemen like myself, the Federal Government under the direction of the President will continue to operate the roads during the war and for a considerable period thereafter.

Mr. Chairman, with that preliminary statement I wish to state for the information of the committee that the amendment just offered is in identical language to one offered in the Senate on last Friday. To my way of thinking the compensation allowed the owners of railroad stock in section 1 of the bill is indefensible and preposterous. That is especially true in view of the fact that the people freely give the Government the use of their money at 4 per cent and will continue to do so as long as the Government has need for it. Organized wealth should be required to sacrifice as well as the people during this war. Under the circumstances, together with all the other guaranties of this bill to railroads, the adoption of this amendment would not only be just compensation to owners of railroad stocks, but it would be liberal compensation as well.

This morning the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] undertook to defend this section by invoking a rule of law that the compensation to which the railroads are entitled is the value of the use of the railroad property at the time of taking over.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. RAMSEYER. I will ask the gentleman to be brief, because I have only a few minutes.

Mr. DEWALT. The legal statement that I tried to make was this: That the measure of damages for taking property is to be estimated upon the value of the property at the time of the taking.

Mr. RAMSEYER. That would be December 28, 1917.

Mr. DEWALT. Yes; but that is the actual taking of the property. When you take only the use of the property then a different rule would apply. You must estimate what the use is worth.

Mr. RAMSEYER. And when.

Mr. DEWALT. Not at the time, because if you did you might possibly get an overestimate or an underestimate because the value of the use of the property would differ at different times. It might be $10,000,000 one year and $5,000,000 another year. Therefore you must strike an average and determine what that is worth.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I am very glad the gentleman has made that statement, because several members of the gentleman's committee have gotten up here and contended it was exactly as I stated it. For instance, the gentleman who just left the floor a while ago, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE], made this statement: "Pay for a man's property that which he has been getting." Now, the natural inference from that would be that he meant the value of the use of the property at the time it was taken over. Of course, this limitation of 3 years arrived at by the committee is an arbitrary time. It might as well have been 5 years or 10 years or 15 years, and would have been just as legal as the 3-year limit. Now, I do wish to call to the attention of the committee some figures that the stockholders of the road are going to be permitted to earn. Members of the committee who spoke here I know confused some Members as to the terms "stocks," "bonds," and "property investment." Now, the table which the Interstate Commerce Commission furnished, and which was set out fully in the minority report of Senator CUMMINS and published in the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], shows the returns on the capital stock. Some gentleman of the committee made answer that, although the percentage of net income returned on capital stock as shown by this table was high, if the calculation be made on the property investment it is not so high. Now, my understanding of this bill is that you undertake to guarantee to the railroads the interest on their bonds, all the operating expenses, taxes, maintenance, make allowance for depreciation, and so forth, and then give the stockholders the average net income that they have been getting for three years prior to June 30, 1917, either as dividends or to be used as part dividends and part surplus, as they may see fit. Now, if I am not right about this I would like to be corrected.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STEVENSON. I understood the gentleman both in his amendment and in his remarks to say that the standard return was the income after paying the interest on bonds, as well as paying the operating expenses. Does the gentleman understand the bill to mean that?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Section 1 will do just what I said it would do. That is what I said, and no member of the committee made any objection to it. I am, of course, now speaking of the effect the bill will have stripped of technical terms.

Mr. STEVENSON. They used the term "standard return" the same as railroad operating income and that——

Mr. RAMSEYER. That has a technical meaning, and I would like to call attention——

Mr. STEVENSON. But I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the railway operating income is that which is left after paying certain expenses, of which interest on bonds is not one at all.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. The table to which I referred gives the average per cent of net income, which does include payment of interest on bonds.

Mr. STEVENSON. I am referring to the fact that the standard return provided for in this bill does not provide that the Government is to pay interest on the bonds at all.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Who is going to pay it? The interest on bonds must be paid while the railroads are under Federal control as it was before.

Mr. STEVENSON. They pay it out of the standard return that is turned over to the railroads themselves, that is the way I understand it.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Of course, the interest on bonds must be taken care of before the railroads can realize the net income shown in the table. You are not going to let the interest on bonds go unpaid; you have to take care of the interest on bonds before the railroads can realize this net income.

Mr. STEVENSON. No, sir; that is not the provision of the bill as I understand it. They have to pay them the standard return and out of that they pay their interest as they do their dividends.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I understand the bill the way I have explained it. The practical results will be the same. In either event the guaranty of this bill covers, among other things, the interest on bonds and dividends on capital stock, and if the earnings of the railroads are insufficient we reach into the Federal Treasury to make them up.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. I will.

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the claim of this bill for the standard return is a sum fixed by the President that they shall be entitled to receive plus, later on, certain additions or subtractions. It is not operating railway income at all; it is a fixed sum.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I understand that. The bill undertakes to authorize the President to pay the railroads not to exceed a certain amount. But both the President and the Director General have declared the railroads should have the maximum amount allowed in the bill. That amount I contend is too high. We all know that the Director General will make agreements with the railroads allowing them the maximum under the bill, for that is what he has repeatedly stated should be done. Knowing what the Director General's intentions are, it is absurd to give him that power and then stand back and say if he does do that thing we will show him up to the people.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Is it in the nature of an explanation?

Mr. BARKLEY. No; but possibly it may be an explanatory question.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Is it to inform me or to inform the gentleman?

Mr. BARKLEY. Well, I do not know that the question will inform either one of us much.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman ask the question?

Mr. BARKLEY. Does not the gentleman know that there are many railroads where the amount of their capital stock does not correctly reflect the amount of money invested?

Mr. RAMSEYER. That is true.

Mr. BARKLEY. Because they have sometimes returned large sums of money and put that money into improvements and betterments and have not increased their stock——

Mr. RAMSEYER. I understand that. The percentage you are going to allow is on the capital stock?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Now, right here let me see whether we have the same understanding of the terms "capital stock," "bonds," and "property investment." Now, suppose you had a farm for which you are asked to pay $10,000 and you put $3,000 of your own money in and $7,000 under a mortgage. At the end of the year after paying interest on the mortgage and operating expenses of the farm and taxes you have $1,000 left. Now, that is 10 per cent on the property investment, is it not, but it is 33⅓ per cent on the money you have in it? Carry that analogy to the whole railroad system of the United States; we have bonds to the amount of $10,021,730,075, eliminating duplications; capital stock, $6,514,750,554, eliminating duplications. Add the amount of bonds and stocks and we have $16,336,300,336, which represents the property investment. The interest on the bonds is a fixed charge, just like the interest on the mortgage, and what is left after interest on bonds, operating expenses, and so forth, are paid goes to the stockholders as dividends. Under this bill the railroads will get annually $955,000,000. The bondholders, like the mortgagee, get a fixed rate of interest, about 4 per cent, or annually, in round numbers, $400,000,000. The stockholders will receive $550,000,000, or an average of 8½ per cent on the capital stock. The stockholders of some roads receive a much larger net income than others. So, when Members speak of net income on capital stock as excessive and exorbitant, it is unfair, and no answer to call attention to the property investment.

At this place I ask to have printed in the RECORD the table I referred to a while ago from the Interstate Commerce Commission. The figures in this table have been neither challenged nor contradicted.

The table referred to is as follows:

Mr. RAMSEYER. Taken from the same report, I call your attention to certain large and well-known railroads. Under the provisions of this bill each of the following roads will have net for its stockholders annually during Federal control:

	Per cent.
The Pennsylvania Railroad Co	8.92
The Pennsylvania Co	11.92
The New York Central Railroad Co	12.96
The Philadelphia & Reading Railway Co	25.70
Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co	32.90
Michigan Central Railroad Co	18.48
Central Railroad Co. of New Jersey	20.25
Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington Railroad Co	11.50
Hocking Valley Railway Co	11.94
Illinois Central Railroad Co	11.33
Louisville & Nashville Railway Co	16.75
Norfolk & Western Railway Co	12.51

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Iowa be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Iowa be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOREMUS. Will the gentleman permit a question? If you are the owner of that farm to which you have just directed our attention by way of illustration, and the Government took that farm over, what do you think your return should be?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Now, of course, I was speaking of a farm merely to illustrate terms to Members who know more about farm terminology than they do of railroad terminology. To get back to the subject matter, let us speak of that farm as a railroad.

Mr. DOREMUS. No; let us call it a farm.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Wait. I am answering the question and I want to answer it in my own way, so that we can get the distinction.

Mr. DOREMUS. All right.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Take a small railroad which cost $10,000. Seven thousand dollars represents bonds, $3,000 represents stocks, and $10,000 would represent the property investment. Ten thousand dollars might represent the value of the road or might not. Now, when you are trying to determine what the return should be for the stocks, it is not fair to cover over the whole amount of property invested, because the $7,000 is in the hands of bondholders and they get a certain fixed rate, 4 per cent or 5 per cent, say. And when you are going to pay the stockholders you should only pay them a just compensation on the capital they have actually in the road and which they own.

Mr. SWITZER. Just one question. Is it not true that interest on bonds is paid out of the standard return?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Well, it is paid out. What the Government undertakes to pay the railroads must of necessity cover interest on bonds before the owners of the capital stock can come in for dividends.

Mr. SWITZER. If there is nothing left, we do not get anything.

Mr. RAMSEYER. These figures in the table I just referred to have not been disputed. Day before yesterday, in addressing questions to the chairman of this committee, I asked him whether it was not true that stockholders were getting these large percentages, and I called especial attention to the return of the Bessemer and the Lehigh roads, and he said it was true, as far as the capital stock was concerned, and that these large percentages are going to the stockholders. Here is the colloquy to which I refer:

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield for a relevant question? In the table prepared by the Interstate Commerce Commission and printed with the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] yesterday he gives the percentages of net income on these various roads.

Mr. SIMS. On what?
Mr. RAMSEYER. On capitalization.
Mr. SIMS. On stock?
Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes, sir.
Mr. SIMS. All right; go ahead.
Mr. RAMSEYER. Now, here is the Lehigh Road, 27.98.
Mr. SIMS. On the stock?
Mr. RAMSEYER. That means that the stockholders are getting that much upon the face value of their stock, does it not?
Mr. SIMS. Yes.
Mr. RAMSEYER. Now, in regard to Bessemer, that means that the fellows who own the stock, not the bonds, will get 647 per cent?
Mr. SIMS. I told you that.

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. I should like to call attention to some figures here, and I do not yield.

Going over the table that I referred to, I see that there are 86 roads that will receive over 5 per cent on their capital stock. Of those, 13 roads will get over 26 per cent on the capital stock, mind you, not on the property investment. I claim it is unfair to get up here and contend that a certain income on capital stock is right, because, spread over all the property investment, the rate is lower. The incomes shown in this table are on the capital stock and not on the property investment.

The following roads will receive over 26 per cent on their capital stock under the provisions of this bill:

	Per cent.
Lehigh & Hudson River Ry. Co	27.98
Staten Island Rapid Transit Co	32.02
Delaware, Lackawanna & Western R. R. Co	32.90
New York, Philadelphia & Norfolk R. R. Co	35.74

Chicago & Erie R. R. Co	70.45
Duluth, Missabe & Northern Ry. Co	114.12
Colorado & Wyoming Ry. Co	162.64
Bessemer & Lake Erie R. R. Co	647.22

Mr. Chairman, section 6 appropriates $500,000,000 out of any moneys in the Treasury for the purpose of paying the expenses of Federal control and the compensation guaranteed in this bill. How did this $500,000,000 get in the Treasury? By taxes paid by the people, by bonds sold to the people bearing 3½ per cent and 4 per cent interest, and by the sale of thrift stamps to the men, women, and children of the land. In other words, the tax money, money from bonds and thrift stamps, which the people have loaned gladly and willingly to their Government at not to exceed 4 per cent interest, the proponents of this bill ask us to use to pay the stockholders of the railroads annually 10 per cent, 20 per cent, and more on their capital stock. I submit that is unfair to the people. It is the people's money that will make up 25.70 per cent to the Philadelphia & Reading Railway Co., 32.9 per cent to the Lackawanna Railroad Co., 20.25 per cent to the Central Railroad Co. of New Jersey, 22.05 per cent to the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad Co., and so forth.

The proponents of this bill say that unless we vote the railroad stockholders this unreasonable compensation the railroads will go into court and be allowed the value of the use of these roads at the time of taking over, which will amount to as much as the bill allows and maybe more. If Congress in this war excitement has lost its equilibrium, it has no right to presume that the courts have also. If the roads have the constitutional right to compensation measured by the value of the use at the time of taking over, December 28, 1917, what right has Congress to fix the earnings of the roads over a 3-year period ending June 30, 1917? And if Congress has the right to fix a 3-year period, why not a period of 5 years or 10 years or 15 years? This bill attempts to fix the compensation during the war and at least for three or four years thereafter. Do you not suppose that the courts will take cognizance of the fact that we are in war and that conditions are abnormal? Do you not suppose that the courts will recognize the fact that for at least two years prior to June 30, 1917, times were abnormal and that the roads were receiving abnormally high returns? And do you not think the courts are still possessed with sufficient common sense to know that as soon as the war ends and during the period of Federal control of three or four years thereafter the roads will likely not earn more than during normal times, and maybe a great deal less?

For illustration, each year at Des Moines, Iowa, is held the greatest State fair in the United States, and for about two weeks the street cars of that city, owing to greatly increased passenger traffic, earn unusual returns. Suppose during the midst of the fair for some reason the Government should take over the street railway system of Des Moines for a year. Under the contention set forth by some of the committee reporting this bill, the street railway would be entitled to the value of the use of the railway at the time of taking over. That is, their earnings for 52 weeks would be fixed at what they were earning during the abnormal two weeks of the fair. Will any gentleman here get up and contend that any court in the land would do so absurd a thing? If the times have caused us to lose faith in mankind, let us, for Heaven's sake, still retain a little faith in our institutions, especially our courts. No amount of arguing or legal quibbling will convince the people of the country that our courts will hold that an unreasonable compensation, an extravagant compensation, an abnormal compensation is just compensation under the Constitution or that, if the railroads choose to go into court, will the courts hold that the unreasonable and extravagant compensation of this bill is just compensation? In legislating generously for the owners of railroad stock the committee should not forget to be fair to the people, out of whose pockets will come the money to pay the generous compensation which the bill guarantees to the owners of railroad stock.

I am not proposing this amendment because of hostility to railroads, because I have none. On the other hand, I realize that the commercial needs of the country demand that our railroads should be greatly improved and extended. It seems to be conceded that before a year of Federal control the Government will expend from $1,000,000,000 to $2,000,000,000 in railway improvements and extensions. I want to see the sum so expended inure to the benefit of the public permanently. When the roads were taken over there was no other alternative for the President. He did the right thing. The compensation provided in this bill for the owners of the railway capital stock is excessive. My amendment is fair both to them and the people. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment on the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. We will get to it in a minute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. LENROOT offers the following: Page 2, line 22, strike out the words "standard return" and insert "average annual railway operating income."

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, the scheme of this bill—and it is a proper one—is that the President within the maximum that is provided by the bill may agree to pay a railroad a certain specific sum, and that certain specific sum becomes the standard return for that railroad. That may later be increased or decreased, as the case may be. It may be increased if there be compensation for betterments and road extensions, and so forth. It may be decreased in case of retirements and matters of that kind. But in the use of the standard return, in line 22, they evidently had in mind the average railway operating income, because they say this standard return is to be determined by the Interstate Commerce Commission. That is not what the committee means. The President is to determine that. The Interstate Commerce Commission is to determine the average annual net railway operating income for the three years. And that my construction is correct can be readily demonstrated by turning to line 15 on the same page, where they provide "that any railway operating the income accruing during the period of Federal control in excess of such standard return shall remain the property of the United States." Of course, they must there have had in mind the fixed sum the President agrees to pay.

They would not have had in mind a maximum sum, because if they had had in mind a maximum sum what would become of the money between that maximum sum and the sum that the President agreed to pay? Then, over on page 3, the words "standard return" are again used in line 12, for it is provided that the taxes shall be charged or deducted against the "standard return." Again, having in mind the fixed sum that is contained in the agreement that the President agrees to pay, it would be an idle thing to provide that the taxes should be deducted from the maximum return when the maximum return is merely a limitation upon the President. Again, on the next page, in line 13, it is provided that the United States, still continuing on the agreement, "may by deductions from the standard return or by other proper means and charges be reimbursed for the cost of any additions, repairs, renewals, and betterments to such property," again clearly showing that the use of the term "standard return" means not the average railway operating income unless it should happen to mean the same, because the President might fix the same sum as the average railway operating income. But it is clear that in every case, except the one I seek to amend, the words "standard return" mean not the average railway operating income, but they mean the sum that the President agreed to pay, which under the bill may be either increased or decreased within the maximum, according to the provisions of the bill. And that is further carried out, as you will see if you will turn to the end of this paragraph, where this language occurs:

The certificate of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall for the purpose of such an agreement be taken as conclusive of the amount of such average annual railway operating income.

Now, Mr. Chairman, unless this amendment is adopted, you will have this situation, that while in the first paragraph you give the President the authority to make an agreement with the railroads as to the amount which they will receive within the maximum that is provided in this language, unless my amendment is adopted, you say to the Interstate Commerce Commission that you shall decide for the President what sum he shall pay. Of course, that was not the intention of the committee, and I think that upon reflection that the committee will accept the amendment.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin if the words "standard return," as defined in the place where he offers the amendment, do not mean merely annual railway operating income?

Mr. LENROOT. No; they do not. If the gentleman will turn to line 15, as I tried to show, there he will find that the use of the words "standard return" means not the average operating income but the sum that the President agrees to pay; and so on page 3, line 12, and on page 4, line 13. And the gentleman will remember that in the original bill which was introduced by him that is where the confusion arises—that the average railway operating income was the fixed sum that the railroad was entitled to receive, so that in that case the standard return and the railway operating income meant the same. But now the words "railway operating income" are not a fixed sum, but the maximum. If this amendment is adopted it will clear the whole thing up.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman means, in effect, that is what it means?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. The language in the bill defining standard return says, "During the period of such Federal control it shall receive as compensation not exceeding the annual income."

Mr. LENROOT. The words "not exceeding" are stricken out.

Mr. SIMS. That was the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes. It has been adopted.

Mr. SIMS. Oh, yes; by the amendment adopted this morning—

An annual sum herein called standard return payable from time to time in reasonable installments for each year and pro rata for any fraction of a year of such Federal control or equivalent, as nearly as may be, to the average annual railway operating income.

Mr. LENROOT. Not exceeding the equivalent.

Mr. SIMS. Yes; not exceeding the equivalent. That is what the standard return means, and everywhere it is referred to in the bill it carries that meaning.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes. It carries the meaning that it is the fixed sum, except in the one instance that I seek to amend, that the President shall pay.

Mr. SIMS. You propose to amend the language before the average annual railway operating income?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. In other words, they are equivalent? They are equal to each other. What is equal to another is equivalent?

Mr. LENROOT. No; but the President may agree to pay them a less sum than this.

Mr. SIMS. I know the gentleman is perfectly serious in this matter and so am I. I think we ought not to try too rigidly to define and include all the stipulations of the contract.

Mr. LENROOT. No; but the gentleman will see that the words "standard return" should have a uniform meaning in the bill. In one place it now means one thing. In this particular place it means, or the intention was to make it mean, the average annual railway operating income, but everywhere else in the bill it means the sum the President agrees to pay.

Mr. STEVENSON. If the President makes the contract on the maximum, it would not make any difference, but if he made it on the basis of lower than the maximum they would have confusion?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes. That is the point.

Mr. SIMS. According to my present understanding of it, as to what the gentleman means to accomplish, I see no objection to it. But there is this objection generally, that amendments here spring up suddenly. This is not one of the amendments that the gentleman published in the RECORD. I might make a mistake and the gentleman might. In doing this I do not want to be precluded from returning and correcting a mistake if I should find that it is one.

Mr. LENROOT. There would be no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers a further amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LENROOT: Page 2, line 21, before the period, insert a comma and the following: "but debits and credits arising from the operation of such street electric passenger railways, including railways commonly called 'interurban,' as are at the time of the agreement not under Federal control, shall be excluded."

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, it will be remembered that the President, in his proclamation taking over these systems of transportation, expressly excluded from Federal control and did not take over electric and interurban lines. Now, unless this amendment is adopted we will have this situation: The railroads owns electric and interurban lines. Their operating returns to the Interstate Commerce Commission include the earnings of the electric and interurban lines; and unless this amendment is adopted, in our direction to the Interstate Commerce Commission to ascertain the average net operating income to form the basis of compensation which the railroads are entitled to receive, the earnings of these roads not taken over will be included. My amendment only provides that their debits and credits arising out of this proposition—of these roads not taken over by the Government—shall be excluded.

Mr. HAMLIN. On the same page I notice it says in line 2—

equivalent as nearly as may be to its average annual railway operating income (including therein such income of lines acquired by, leased to, or consolidated with such carrier between July 1, 1914, and Dec. 31, 1917) for the three years ended June 30, 1917—

Now, if the gentleman's amendment is adopted, why should not that be stricken out?

Mr. LENROOT. No; for that reaches an entirely different matter.

Mr. HAMLIN. If they have a traffic agreement with these interurban lines or electric lines, that increases the revenue of these roads.

Mr. LENROOT. No; I think the chairman of the committee will bear me out in saying that the words included in that bracket are intended to include only such leased roads as are taken over by the Government. That is true, is it not?

Mr. SIMS. If they take over a system that has leased roads, they take the leased roads over too.

Mr. LENROOT. That is true; but the Government does not take over electric lines whether leased or not, because they are expressly excluded by the proclamation.

Mr. HAMLIN. I rather agree with the gentleman, I think; but if his amendment is adopted will we not have to change the wording included in parentheses on this same page, because this seems to include all electric lines and everything else, if they are operated in conjunction with the road that is taken over?

Mr. LENROOT. I am inclined to agree with the gentleman, although I think my amendment would be broad enough to cover both.

Mr. HAMLIN. Perhaps it might.

Mr. TOWNER. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that I do not think he stated quite accurately the proclamation of the President. The proclamation of the President includes all of those systems of transportation engaged in general transportation whether operated by steam or electric power; so when the gentleman says the proclamation does not include electric lines engaged in general transportation his statement is not quite accurate.

Mr. LENROOT. I think I stated it too broadly in my remarks, but I think my amendment covers exactly the point.

Mr. TOWNER. The gentleman is well aware that some great trunk lines—for instance, the Milwaukee Railroad—operate a portion of their lines almost exclusively by electric power.

Mr. SIMS. Several hundred miles.

Mr. TOWNER. And there are quite a number of lines engaged in general transportation that are operated by electric power. In fact, it seems to me the President intended to take over, and the language is that the President intended to take over all roads engaged in general transportation. That seems to be the determining feature.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LENROOT. I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LENROOT. If the gentleman will permit me, my amendment reads—from the operation of such street electric passenger railways, including railways commonly called interurbans, as are at the time of the agreement not under Federal control.

Mr. TOWNER. I was not complaining at all of the amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. I think I made my statement too broad.

Mr. FESS. I recall one road in Ohio that has a trolley system, but at the same time it is a steam line, too, operating over the same tracks.

Mr. LENROOT. All my amendment does, if we have not taken over any such roads, is that in giving the compensation to the carriers we ought not to include the income of such roads as we have not taken over.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I can not see how this amendment is necessary at all. I see the purpose of it. The purpose is all right, but the President does not intend, and so specifically states, to take over the street car and interurban electric lines. The President's proclamation excludes street car and interurban railroads, and by no possibility could the income from these roads be affected by this bill. Now, the gentleman must presume, for his amendment to be worth anything, that the representatives of the Government, in making a contract with any particular carrier, would be so careless as to include in the standard return received the revenues from some such line not taken over. Now, how can he assume that any sane lawyer, in drawing a contract with the Government, would ever think of including in the terms of the contract property that had not been taken over by the Government.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman does not get the point. The provision that I seek to amend has nothing to do with the discretion of the President. The provision I seek to amend is a mandatory direction to the Interstate Commerce Commission as to what they shall certify to the President; and I simply say that without this they would be compelled to certify all of the operating returns of a carrier from whatever source derived. My amendment simply requires the Interstate Commerce Commission to deduct from that operating revenue the revenue derived from roads that are not taken over by the Government.

Mr. SIMS. But, my friend, would not the Interstate Commerce Commission in making its report of the returns reported by the railroads set out so much as is received from street car and interurban lines?

Mr. LENROOT. No; because the railroad may return that in its general operating return to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and unless they are expressly directed to investigate and exclude such returns they would include the returns from such roads without any further authority.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, if I thought there was any danger at all of any such thing happening I could see some use in this amendment, but I can not see how there could be any reasonable probability that any contract could be entered into which would include the street cars or street car lines or interurban roads, that were no part of the general transportation system taken over. Therefore, I do not think the amendment is necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LENROOT) there were 46 ayes and 21 noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 3, strike out lines 3 to 8, both inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "be to seven per centum upon the actual fair value of the property taken at the time of the taking, and in addition."

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, the effect of this amendment is to substitute an entirely different standard of compensation. The bill as it stands takes the income for three years and divides it by 3, and makes the result the standard by which compensation for the taking shall be made. My amendment, if adopted, will give to the railroads as compensation 7 per cent upon the actual value of their property at the time it was taken. I substitute for the arbitrary and fanciful standard of the bill a standard established by Article V of the Constitution as construed by the Supreme Court of the United States. It is fair to the railroads and it is fair to the people. The only argument that has been made against it, or that can be made against it, is that delay may ensue in ascertaining what the value of the property is. That is a mere detail, and the same difficulty will arise in ascertaining the standard established by the bill, although perhaps not to the same extent as the method written in the bill. And although there may be an increased difficulty in determining by judicial proceeding exactly what the amount to be allowed is, that difficulty is not so great as to justify the House in departing from the principles of justice established by the Constitution.

Mr. DILLON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I will.

Mr. DILLON. Does the gentleman distinguish between compensation for use of property and compensation for the property itself?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. There is absolutely no difference. I have been surprised by the labored efforts of gentlemen undertaking to make some distinction between standards of compensation for the taking of property temporarily and taking it permanently. I have been surprised to hear gentlemen who ought to know better if they do not, argue that we are bound to accept as a standard, as conclusive, the showing of what the temporary value is by what the property has been earning. Gentlemen ought to know the law. The law is that income is merely one factor in determining what the temporary value is. Proof as to the earning power of the property is just as germane where the property is taken permanently as when taken temporarily. It is a mere factor. Other factors are also to be considered.

Now, when we take property of a railroad corporation for public purposes we are doing a slightly different thing from taking property from a private individual which he devotes to his own private use. In the latter case the individual is entitled to use his property in such manner as to get the largest income possible, whether it be fair or in the public interest or not; he is entitled to get all the traffic will bear. But such is not the case with railroad property. No railroad has a right to charge anything beyond a reasonable and fair income.

Anything beyond that is extortion and can not properly and legally be allowed. We must, therefore, conclusively assume that the railroads have been earning only a reasonable income and must fix the compensation to be paid by the Government accordingly. We must assume this—not that the rates charged have been just, but that a fair return is just, even if a reduction of rates is made.

Mr. DILLON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes.

Mr. DILLON. Will the gentleman tell the committee how he is going to determine the value of the property when the Interstate Commerce Commission says it will take four years to determine the physical value?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I had as lieve undertake to answer that as to answer how we are going to determine the compensation under the standard put in the bill. It is just as easy to do one as to do the other. It is just as easy to fix the value of the property as to ascertain what the incomes of the railroads really were during the three years named in the bill. The question is a bigger one, but not more difficult or troublesome.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. HUDDLESTON) there were 6 ayes and 48 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 6, strike out the words "called herein carrier" and the parentheses.

Page 1, line 7, strike out the words "any such carrier" and insert "the owner of any such railroad or system."

"Wherever used in this act, the word 'owner' includes any person, corporation, partnership, or association who, during any portion of the period of Federal control of a railroad or system of transportation would be entitled to the possession, use, and control of such railroad or system in the absence of Federal control thereof. Wherever in this act reference is made to the period of Federal control in connection with an owner it shall be taken to refer to the portion of such period during which such owner, but for such Federal control, would have been entitled to the possession, use, and control of the railroad or system of transportation."

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say to the chairman that in order to expedite the bill I am not going to press this amendment, but I desire to make a very brief statement, so that he may have it in mind when he goes into conference. As I stated the other day, the bill as it now reads recites that we have taken over certain transportation systems, and they are "herein termed carriers." We have not taken over any corporations. We have taken over certain physical property. Then, the bill authorizes the President to make an agreement with that physical property, that we shall pay it so much, which of course is an absurdity, but of course a court would properly construe that as to intention.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. How could they agree with the carrier if they did not agree with the owner of the carrier?

Mr. LENROOT. I say that I have no question about the way the court will construe it, but you might as well say, as far as phraseology is concerned, that if we take over a horse we will agree with the horse. I am speaking about the phraseology of the bill, and I want to say that it has been stated to me several times privately that they have followed the interstate-commerce act. They have not followed the interstate-commerce act, for that act all through it makes distinction between a railroad as a property and a corporation which is termed a common carrier.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I want to direct the gentleman's attention to the fact that the act of 1916 says that the Government shall utilize not the railways but the systems of transportation, and I believe that means to utilize the corporation, its organization, and keep the corporation for the use of the Government, not taking away its servant but to utilize the corporation.

Mr. LENROOT. My only answer is that we have not taken over the corporations, but here is a more serious question that does present itself, and that I think ought to have the consideration of the committee. If an agreement is made with a system for all roads that are under its control at the time we take them over, suppose a lease of a road that it has expires the next month after the agreement is made. Certainly the compensation should not continue to that carrier, but the agreement should be made with the owner of that road, and therefore there should be a clear definition of ownership rather than the mere taking over of systems of transportation. In other words, the President ought not to be limited to making agreements with the systems of transportation or with the owners of transportation that did own them at the time we happened to take them over. Whenever they become a separate entity again, of course they have the right to go into court and get compensation, and if we agree to pay the system compensation, covering the compensation they are entitled to, we will be paying it twice, As I say, I understand very well that that presents a question of policy, and I am not going to press the amendment, but I do seriously ask the chairman to give that consideration when we go into conference.

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, strike out all after the word "States," in line 16, through the word "act," in line 18, and, on page 5, after line 19, insert the following as a separate paragraph:

"The agreement shall also provide that the owner shall accept all the terms and conditions of this act and any regulation or order made by or through the President under authority of this act or of that portion of the act entitled 'An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes,' approved August 29, 1916, which authorizes the President in time of war to take possession, assume control, and utilize systems of transportation."

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, this is an amendment that I sincerely hope the chairman will accept. It strikes out the language—and that each carrier so agreeing shall thereby become subject to all the provisions of this act.

If the language that I propose to strike out was connected up with the agreement there would probably be no objection to it, but it stands as a legislative declaration that a carrier agreeing to become subject to all of the provisions of the act, leaving the implication that if a carrier does not see fit to make an agreement it is not subject to any of the provisions of the act.

Mr. BARKLEY. How can Congress compel any railroad that does not enter into this agreement to agree to accept anything? Of course, this bill provides for the compensation of railroads. They may not accept this compensation. They may say, "We will stand on our lawful rights as they exist under the law and go into court and get fair and just compensation." How can we compel a road that does not enter into a contract with the Government to accept anything?

Mr. LENROOT. Does the gentleman think there are no provisions in this bill that are binding on a railroad, whether it makes an agreement or not?

Mr. BARKLEY. No; I do not. I say there are provisions here that are binding provided the courts sustain them, but we can not make a contract with them if they do not want to.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman does not get the point.

Mr. BARKLEY. If they do not want to accept the provisions of the bill, we can not compel them to. If the provisions of the bill are constitutional and lawful, they must accept them, whether they agree to them or not; so it is not necessary as far as that is concerned.

Mr. LENROOT. No.

Mr. BARKLEY. But you are attempting here to compel railroads who do not voluntarily enter into a contract with the Government to accept things they may desire to go into court and fight.

Mr. LENROOT. I am not attempting any such thing. The gentleman, however, by insisting on the language being retained, says, in effect, to a railroad: "If you will enter into this agreement, then you are bound by all the provisions of the act; but if you do not choose to agree, there is nothing in this act that applies to you."

Mr. BARKLEY. That is not the intention, and that is not the impression I am trying to leave on the gentleman's mind; but this provision that the gentleman strikes out on page 2 is a provision in connection with the terms of the contract that is entered into between the roads and the Government, if there is a contract. If there is no contract, it does not apply; and it states that these roads which enter into this contract must agree in the agreement that they accept the terms of the bill, and I sincerely contend that it is very doubtful whether Congress may control a railroad that does not enter this contract as to compensation to accept anything.

Mr. LENROOT. Let me put the question to the gentleman. Suppose the language had been a little different than it is here and had been in this way: That any carrier agreeing to make a contract as is herein authorized shall be subject to the provisions of this act. Does the gentleman contend, then, that the carrier not agreeing would be subject to any provision that imposed any restriction upon the carrier?

Mr. BARKLEY. The bill itself is broad enough to cover in the general terms the operation of railroads and the characters of returns made by the Interstate Commerce Commission, the revolving fund, depreciation, betterments, and all the provisions of the bill; it is sufficient to cover them by reason of the fact that they have been taken over, but in making a contract with these companies by the Government I do not think it is wise to attempt to bind by a contract that is made with those who do agree those who do not agree as to the terms of the contract made.

Mr. LENROOT. There is nothing in my mind or any suggestion I have made that even squints at anything of that kind. My proposed amendment is merely a substitute for the language that is found in the bill, which, upon its face, would exclude carriers that do not agree from being subject to the provisions of the bill at all. My amendment merely provides that in every such agreement there shall be a provision that the carrier making this agreement accept all other provisions of this act and thereby become bound not only by the provisions of the act, but by virtue of the contractual relation as well.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is exactly the language the gentleman strikes out in his amendment——

Mr. LENROOT. No; it is not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin I believe left out a portion of the amendment which he had printed.

Mr. LENROOT. I did.

Mr. SIMS. Embracing forfeiture provisions.

Mr. LENROOT. That is true.

Mr. SIMS. And now the gentleman's amendment would read, as I understand it—

The agreement shall also provide that the owner shall accept all the terms and conditions of this act and any regulation or order made by or through the President under authority of this act or of that portion of the act—

And so forth.

Now, if I understand the effect of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], the contracting party would have to agree to comply with any order made by the Director General or anyone authorized by him?

Mr. LENROOT. Any lawful order.

Mr. SIMS. Any lawful order; and yet he does not define what a lawful order is.

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, no.

Mr. SIMS. I can see this, Mr. Chairman—I think I can—that it may deter and prevent contracts being made that would be of advantage to make. It is dangerous to try to place too many stipulations in an act for a contract. The contract ought to be limited, as a matter of course, in a general way—I mean as to the power to make it—and then leave the details of that contract to the authorities drawing it up—the administration, the President—but to require those carriers to agree to any act, regulation, or order made through the President, I do not see what use it would be to require them to agree to something that perhaps they think would be ruinous to them, because they might believe that the order made by the Director General or somebody under him would be ruinous or damaging, and all that kind of thing, and therefore they would hesitate to make the contract.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. I see the purpose of the gentleman, and I approve of his purpose, and I was going to say it seems to me that these are mere hindrances to making contracts, and which ought to be left to the stipulations to be embraced in the contract instead of prescribing them. Let them have the prescribing words in the contract. When you insert the prescribing words in a section you inferentially exclude everything not prescribed, and there is danger——

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield to me? I am sure the gentleman does not wish, when this act is passed, to have a legal question raised as to whether any road is covered by this act that does not come to an agreement under this proposition.

Mr. SIMS. If they do not make an agreement, of course, it is covered in the act.

Mr. LENROOT. But when you say, as you do say in the language I am trying to change, that if they make an agreement they shall be bound by the act, there is an implication that if they do not make an agreement they will not be bound by the act.

Mr. SIMS. If they do not, they do not come under section 1 at all, and are provided for in other sections.

Mr. LENROOT. You are not confining it to section 1; you are saying they are bound by the provision of this act if they make an agreement, and have not you raised at once a very serious legal question that the intention is that only the agreeing roads are covered——

Mr. SIMS. No——

Mr. LENROOT. My amendment will leave every road, whether agreeing or not agreeing, subject to the provisions of the act, and in addition by making the contract they accept in a contractual way the provisions of the act and thereby avoid a very serious legal situation that may well arise under this language.

Mr. SIMS. Now, the gentleman's object and purpose is unobjectionable in every way, but I do not see that follows. I think we should leave the bill just as it is. The bill has been thoroughly considered, with a view to trying to prevent any and all of these kinds of things arising, and we must presume that the contract itself will have some provisions in it to protect the Government.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield to a question there?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is it not true that the effect of the amendment would be simply that the railroads that make an agreement agree to not go into court and fight any agreement as to the rate? How can you prevent any other road that does not make an agreement from going into court and fighting a provision of the rate? You can not foreclose the right of nonagreeing roads to go into court and fight any provision of this bill. All we can do is to require that every road that does agree, thereby agrees not to go into court and fight any provision of the bill.

Mr. LENROOT. I want to ask the gentleman, and I think I have asked him before, is it his contention that there is no provision of this act that does not apply to all roads, whether agreeing or nonagreeing?

Mr. BARKLEY. I think it applies to all roads taken over by the Government.

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly. And what I want is to provide that the act covers all roads.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Wisconsin a question. As I understand it, your purpose is to make this bill so that all roads, whether they enter into the contract with the President or not, will be brought within the terms of the act?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes, sir.

Mr. DOREMUS. I am no clear whether the gentleman's amendment will accomplish that purpose. It says the agreement shall also provide so-and-so. Now, let us assume that the railroad does not make the agreement, then does his amendment bring the nonagreeing roads within the terms of the bill?

Mr. LENROOT. They are brought in by the striking out of the language in the bill that I am afraid of. It strikes out the language that the road so agrees. That is the point.

Mr. DOREMUS. As I understand your amendment, it only applies to an agreement.

Mr. LENROOT. It only applies to an agreement.

Mr. DOREMUS. And if the agreement is not made, then will the nonagreeing road be under the provision of the bill?

Mr. LENROOT. If the language I refer to is stricken out of the bill it certainly will.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. SIMS. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 35, noes 31.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. It is the last amendment I have to this first paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LENROOT: Page 2, lines 3 to 7, strike out the parentheses and the words included within them; and at the end of line 21, after the period, insert the following:

"If any lines were acquired by, leased to, or consolidated with such railroads or system between July 1, 1914, and December 31, 1917, both inclusive, and separate operating returns to the Interstate Commerce Commission were not made for such lines after such acquisition, lease, or consolidation, there shall (before the average is computed) be added to the total railway operating income of such railroad or system for the three years ending June 3, 1917, the total operating income of the lines so acquired, leased, or consolidated for the period beginning July 1, 1914, and ending on the same date of such acquisition, lease, or consolidation, or on June 30, 1917, whichever is the earlier."

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman before he begins if that is one of the printed amendments?

Mr. LENROOT. I think it is.

Mr. SIMS. Where is it?

Mr. LENROOT. Page 2, line 3.

Mr. SIMS. Where in the RECORD?

Mr. LENROOT. I thought that was included, but I may be mistaken.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I do not find it.

Mr. LENROOT. No; that was one I held out for revision.

I will say in reference to this that it makes very little change in the original language that it seeks to substitute. It includes the amendment that has been adopted, proposed by my colleague from Wisconsin [Mr ESCH], and what it seeks to clear up is this:

There are two very important questions that arise under the language of the bill. In the first place, it provides for the inclusion therein of "such income." Now, what is "such income" of these leased or consolidated lines? The immediate language preceding is, "the average annual railway operating income." Now, of course, it could not have been the intention of the committee to include as "such income" the average income of these leased lines while under separate control, because there could not be any such thing. It did not have existence during the entire period of three years. Neither could it mean, of course, all the income. It was not the intention to include all the income of such leased roads. I take it that what was intended to be covered by this provision was a case like this: Suppose in 1915 a road was under separate operation, rendered separate operating returns to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and then in 1916 was leased, and during 1916 and 1917 the income from that leased road was included in the operating returns of the lessee. Now, of course, it would not be fair to the carrier in getting at the compensation that is due it not to take into account the income of this road that was leased during this three-year period in ascertaining the maximum to which it was entitled. And evidently the intention of the committee is that in that kind of a case, where a railroad was under separate operation, we will say, in 1915, that that income should be added, not to the average income, but added to the total amount of the three years' income of the carrier making the return, the income for that one year added, and then the sum of that divided by three in order to get the average operating income of the carrier making the return. But that intention is not expressed.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. STEVENSON. Would not that give just one-third of the earning capacity of the leased road?

Mr. LENROOT. No; because the income of the leased road in 1916 and 1917 would be included in their operating returns.

M. STEVENSON. In 1916 and 1917?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; but in 1915 it would not be.

Mr. STEVENSON. Your amendment merely proposes to bring in the income for 1915 and add that to 1916 and 1917?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. So as to get the average of the whole time, and measure the earning capacity of that particular leased line?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes. As it now reads, the members of the committee will readily see that if such income does not refer to the average income—and that is impossible, because there could not be an average of the three years for such carrier—then it means the income of the road prior to its acquisition should be added to the average—an increase that is not fair and that is not just. I take it that the committee could not have had that in mind. I take it that what is intended here, and what is entirely fair, is that any operating income not included in the operating returns of the carrier shall be added to the operating return of the carrier, and that sum total divided by three.

Now, if I am not correct in my conclusion in regard to that I will be glad to be corrected, but if I am correct as to what the intention is it seems to me very clear that my amendment should be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. LENROOT. One minute, Mr. Chairman. My amendment goes one step further; that may or may not be important. If after the acquisition that road continued to render separate operating returns, of course, that should be taken into consideration as well, and my amendment provides for that.

Mr. SIMS. If I get it correctly, as to the language in the lines included in the parentheses, your amendment strikes that out?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. And instead of substituting your amendment within the parentheses to take the place of that striken out you introduce it at the end of the line as a new paragraph?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; as a new paragraph.

Mr. SIMS. On the continuation of the same line to take the place of that stricken out?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. The object and purpose being to do what the lines in parentheses purport to do?

Mr. LENROOT. Well, what the committee intended to do, if I understand it correctly.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I rose simply to ask that question, so that I might know. I supposed the gentleman had published all the amendments that he intended to offer in the RECORD.

Mr. LENROOT. I will say that there were a few that I was not entirely certain about myself, and this is one of them.

Mr. SIMS. And therefore my hard day's work on Sunday did not give me opportunity to study this amendment and look out for its bearings on other portions of the bill. I do not want to oppose an amendment that will help the bill. I do not want to waste time in opposing one that will not hurt the bill. But just now undertaking to say whether this should be substituted for the language in the parentheses or whether it will state it in a better way is something that I am not prepared at this time to pass on.

Mr. LENROOT. I have no desire merely to try to improve the phraseology. I would not try to take the time of the committee if it did not seem that the existing language was seriously defective.

Mr. SIMS. As I understand the contention of the gentleman, it is that the language in the parentheses does not carry out what is clearly intended to be carried out, and his object is to clarify and make certain what he deems is uncertain?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. If that is the fact, it ought to be done. But, as I say, I can not afford to agree to this amendment, and so I will retain the privilege of returning to it, if it is adopted, in the future. But, as I said, this bill has been passed over and considered time and time again by the most competent authorities I know of to pass upon it, and of course their contention is that the language in the parentheses is full and complete, so far as it is necessary to carry out the intention and purpose of it.

Mr. LENROOT. This is one of the provisions that is identical in both the Senate and the House bill, and if I am correct—and I think I am—it certainly seems to be the best way to take care of it and to let the amendment go in and take care of it in conference.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, as I said several times, I think it is dangerous to adopt amendments that are sprung on the House suddenly, where we have had no time to study and investigate them, and therefore I can not accept the amendment, and I reserve the right, as a matter of course, to ask consent to return to this section of the bill and oppose it. But if it means just what the gentleman himself contends it to mean, it is a difference between tweedledum and tweedledee, with perhaps the advantage on the part of tweedledum.

Mr. LENROOT. I shall not object to the gentleman returning to any of these amendments.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman object to returning to it at a future time?

Mr. LENROOT. No. I have no objection to that whatever. Now, I have one more amendment, on taxes.

Mr. SIMS. I understood the gentleman to say this was the last on section 1?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to have the amendment again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will again be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LENROOT: Page 2, lines 3 to 7, strike out the parentheses and the words included within them, and at the end of line 21, after the period, insert the following:

"If any lines were acquired by, leased to, or consolidated with such railroad or system between July 1, 1914, and December 31, 1917, both inclusive, and separate operating returns to the Interstate Commerce Commission were not made for such lines after such acquisition, lease, or consolidation, there shall (before an average is computed) be added to the total railway operating income of such railroad or system for the three years ending June 30, 1917, the total railway operating income of the lines so acquired, leased, or consolidated, for the period beginning July, 1914, and ending on the date of such acquisition, lease, or consolidation, or on June 30, 1917, whichever is the earlier."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I will ask for a division on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 31, noes 35.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chairman appointed Mr. BARKLEY and Mr. LENROOT to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 56, noes 49.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. TOWNER moves to amend as follows: On page 1, to strike out all after the enacting clause down to and including line 11; on page 2, to strike out all of lines 1 to 24, inclusive; on page 3, to strike out lines 1 to 4, inclusive, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the President, having in time of war taken over the possession, use, control, and operation (called herein Federal control) of certain railroads and systems of transportation (called herein carriers), is hereby authorized to agree with and to guarantee to any such carrier that during the period of such Federal control it shall receive as just compensation the payment in full by the United States of the interest as it shall become due during said period on all the bonded indebtedness of the carrier, and also an amount to be paid in annual or semiannual dividends equal to the dividends declared and paid by said carrier on the capital stock of said carrier on the basis of the average of said dividends declared and paid by the carrier during the fiscal years 1915, 1916, and 1917. That any amount collected and received by the United States derived from the revenues and receipts of said carrier in excess of the amounts required for the payment of interest on bonds and dividends on stock and the amounts required to carry out the further guarantees of the United States to the carriers as herein provided, shall be divided into equal parts, one part to be paid the carrier and the other retained by the United States.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I believe I will reserve a point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky reserves a point of order.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. TOWNER moves to amend as follows: On page 1, to strike out all after the enacting clause down to and including line 11; on page 2, to strike out all of lines 1 to 24, inclusive; on page 3, to strike out lines 1 to 4, inclusive, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the President, having in time of war taken over the possession, use, control, and operation (called herein Federal control) of certain railroads and systems of transportation (called herein carriers), is hereby authorized to agree with and to guarantee to any such carrier that during the period of such Federal control it shall receive as just compensation the payment in full by the United States of the interest as it shall become due during said period on all the bonded indebtedness of the carrier, and also an amount to be paid in annual or semiannual dividends equal to the dividends declared and paid by said carrier on the capital stock of said carrier on the basis of the average of said dividends declared and paid by the carrier during the fiscal years 1915, 1916, and 1917. That any amount collected and received by the United States derived from the revenues and receipts of said carrier in excess of the amounts required for the payment of interest on bonds and dividends on stock and the amounts required to carry out the further guarantees of the United States to the carriers as herein provided, shall be divided into equal parts, one part to be paid the carrier and the other retained by the United States."

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, this amendment affects only the provisions of the bill which prescribe the amount of compensation the Government offers to the railroads as payment for their use during the time they shall remain in the possession of the Government.

The Constitution provides that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation. If, when the property is taken, an agreement can be made between the Government and the owner of the property as to what is just compensation, then the matter is amicably determined. But if no agreement can be made, the amount must be determined by arbitration or proceedings in the courts. In the present instance it is not the property itself which is taken over and for which just compensation must be paid, but only the use of such property. The Government must pay to the owners just compensation for the use of their property while it remains in the possession of the Government.

In the provision of the bill which I seek to amend the Government makes an offer to the railroads which, if they accept, will constitute an agreement as to the amount of compensation which the roads are to receive during Government occupancy. It is open to any railroad company to accept the offer and receive such compensation, or reject it and have the amount determined by court proceedings. The Government, representing the people, has no right to pay the railroads more than a just compensation, and the railroads have no right to demand more than a just compensation. The offer of compensation made in the bill should be just compensation, for if the offer is accepted the Government is bound.

Under the provisions of the act of August 29, 1916, the President was authorized to "take possession and assume control of any system or systems of transportation or any part thereof." December 28, 1917, the President exercised the power granted to him, and by proclamation took possession of the railroad systems of the United States and placed them under the control of Secretary McAdoo as Director. This action was a war measure. The Government requisitioned the railroads that it may be better enabled to successfully carry on the war. There is very little opposition either on the part of the railroads or the people to this action of the Government. The railroads are assured of fair treatment by the Government, and the people feel that such action was necessary to a successful prosecution of the war. It is an act, however, of tremendous importance. It requires on the part of Congress legislation that will best carry out its declared purpose and at the same time provide that entire justice be rendered to both the railroads and the people. The defects in the provision regarding compensation contained in the bill are that the amount which is offered to be paid is to be determined upon an unfair basis; that it is excessive in amount as a whole; that it is unequal in application; that instead of preventing litigation and a speedy settlement of the amount of compensation, it will probably result in much litigation and delay; that it offers to the railroads no incentive for wise management and good service, but, on the contrary, offers a premium for indifference and inefficiency.

UNFAIR BASIS.

The amount which the Government offers to the railroads is based upon the average annual railway operating income which they received for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1915, 1916, and 1917. Neither of these years was a normal year. The first year commenced July 1, 1914. The war broke out in Europe August 1, 1914. In the United States the breaking out of the war in Europe almost brought about a panic. During the months that followed an unusual depression in all business existed. The earnings of the railroads were abnormally small. The second year, commencing July 1, 1915, witnessed a remarkable revival of business. War orders for almost all our important products came pouring in. Excessive prices were offered, and a marvelous war-stimulated activity continued throughout the year. The earnings of the railroads rose to a point never before reached. The same conditions continued throughout the third year, commencing July 1, 1916.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I want to ask the gentleman from Iowa why we could not adopt the same standard that the English adopted, that is to say, the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914?

Mr. TOWNER. It is my contention that none of these standards based upon conditions in past years can measure what will be "just compensation" for the future. What the coming years may bring to us we do not know. It may be continued prosperity; it may be adversity or sudden disaster. It is to pay for the use of the railroads during years to come that compensation must be provided. Just compensation during such period should be measured by what conditions are during such period and not by conditions that existed in the past. I have shown that the three years which are to furnish the average provided for in the bill were all abnormal years. It is certain that no period in the past would be a duplicate of the years that are before us, for never were world conditions so unsettled as now.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. TILSON. Does not the gentleman see that if we take any three years it might be extremely unfair to any railroad?

Mr. TOWNER. I do; and I shall discuss that feature presently.

Mr. TILSON. Because they might have devoted a large amount of their income to improvements and betterments during those particular years.

Mr. TOWNER. I understand that.

Mr. TILSON. Why not take 10 or 15 years and spread it over a greater period? Would not that be fair?

Mr. TOWNER. No; for whatever the past has been it is certain the future will be something different. It is for the future we are to provide, and we should not offer what is to be considered a just compensation unless it is based upon conditions that shall exist during that period.

EXCESSIVE IN AMOUNT.

The amount which the Government offers to the railroads, and which, if they accept, will be the compensation paid, is excessive. It is provided that the Government shall pay the railroads an annual amount for their use equal to the average annual railway operating income, based upon the amount received by the railroads during the three fiscal years ending June 30, 1917. The average annual operating income for the years ending June 30, 1917, was about $950,000,000. The amount of railway bonds outstanding is about $10,000,000,000. The amount of interest which must be annually paid on such bonds is about $400,000,000. The amount of capital stock of the railroads at par value is about $6,314,000,000. If from the amount the Government tenders to the railroads, $950,000,000 annually, is deducted the amount required to pay interest on the bonds, $400,000,000, there will remain a balance of $550,000,000, which it is proposed we should give the railroads annually to pay dividends and to add to their surplus. This amounts to more than 8.5 per cent on the par value of all their capital stock.

The proposal of the Government is especially favorable to the larger railroads. If only these are considered, it is found that the net income on the par value of the capital stock of the great railways of the eastern district for the three years was 11.48 per cent, for the southern district it was 12.37 per cent, for the western district it was 9.96 per cent.

Still more unjust will the amount proposed to be paid appear when some particularly favored roads are considered. The percentage on the par value of the capital of the following roads will be:

	Per cent.
New York Central R. R.	12.96
Lackawanna	32.90
Michigan Central	18.48
Northwestern	10.18
Burlington	22.05
St. Paul	12.09
Erie	70.45
Panhandle & Santa Fe	64.37
Colorado & Wyoming	162.64
Duluth, Missabe & Northern	114.12
Bessemer & Lake Erie	647.22

Viewed either from the standpoint of general averages or individual cases, the amount to be paid by the Government is excessive. To pay all the railroads a net return of more than 8.5 per cent is more than a just compensation. The Government pays to the citizen who lends his money to the Government 4 per cent. The railroads who lend their property to the Government are certainly not entitled to receive more than twice as much as the citizen. To pay the larger and more prosperous roads an average of 11.27 per cent is certainly excessive. To pay the enormous amounts which are shown in individual cases is unjustifiable from any standpoint. It is true that in some cases the par value of the stock is not as much as the real value of the investment. But in still more cases the par value represents stock issued which is largely "water" and represents no capital investment.

In the offer made in the bill of the amount to be paid by the Government not only is this annual payment of $950,000,000 to the railroads guaranteed but other large guaranties are made.

Payment of the interest on the bonded indebtedness, amounting to about $400,000,000, is to be paid out of the $950,000,000. Besides this, the Government agrees to guarantee the payment of all the outstanding obligations of the railroads during its occupancy. The maturing obligations amount to in 1918, $182,000,000; 1919, $188,000,000; 1920, $186,000,000; 1921, $440,000,000.

The Government agrees to pay all ordinary taxes, both Federal and State, levied against the railroads while in the possession of the Government. The payment of war taxes, however, is not assumed.

To those roads which had no operating income during the three-year period, the President is authorized to pay such an amount as he may determine.

Five hundred million dollars is appropriated from the Federal Treasury to provide additional equipment, additions, terminals, extensions, to make advances when needed, and for the expenses of Federal control. No provision is made for the repayment or final disposition of such property.

The Government is to pay all the expense of the operation of the roads while under its control. This includes salaries of officers, wages of employees, fuel, and so forth. The Government is to retain all the officers and keep all the men. It is expected that some of the extravagant salaries which certain officers are now receiving will be reduced. It is also expected that the wages of the employees will be increased. Whatever is done the Government will have to pay.

The Government also agrees to pay all maintenance charges. This means keeping the track in repair, the rolling stock in effective condition, and all the property of the roads kept in good condition. The property is guaranteed protection and is to be returned to the railroads in as good condition as when received.

The period of occupancy is fixed by the terms of the bill as during the period of the war, and for two years after a treaty of peace has been proclaimed. All these payments and guarantees must be continued during that period. If the war should continue for years with constantly increasing demands and with constantly enlarging expenditures, still these tremendous obligations to the railroads will continue. If the general business of the country, which will furnish the revenue to reimburse the Government, shall be absorbed in war activities and the revenues derived from rates and fares and charges become negligible, still the Government must continue paying the railroads on the basis of the three most prosperous years in their history. If the war should cease within a year, and the expected depression follow, still for two years the railroads would be maintained, their expenses paid, their dividends would continue and their surplus pile up, no matter what might happen to the other business enterprises of the country.

It has been stated as a justification for the action taken that we are but doing what Great Britain did when she took over her roads. A few days after the war broke out, in August, 1914, Great Britain took over her railroads. As compensation the Government agreed to guarantee the net earnings on the basis of the year 1913, a little over 4 per cent on their bonded indebtedness and about 4 per cent on the capital stock. Our bill guarantees $250,000,000 more per annum proportionally than Great Britain. It guarantees a surplus above dividends eight times as large as Great Britain.

The railroads of the United States had on hand January 1, 1917, in cash $288,000,000. They had in cash, time deposits, and securities of unaffiliated companies $804,000,000. None of this fund is taken over by the Government, so that the Government will start with no surplus, and must operate the systems taken over without a working capital except that derived from the Treasury of the United States.

These agreements and guarantees constitute more than a "just compensaion." They are excessive in amount and ought not to be imposed upon the people.

UNEQUAL IN APPLICATION.

The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] called attention to the fact that the method of payment proposed would be unfair to small railroads who for particular reasons may have had no operating income during the three-year period. That is certainly true, and in order to meet that difficulty the bill provides that if "because of nonoperation, receivership, or any undeveloped or abnormal conditions" the compensation would be "inequitable as a fair measure of just compensation" the President may make such special agreement with such railroad for compensation as may be just. That, as may readily be seen, is necessary and fair, because it would be no defense against a claim for "just compensation" for a railroad taken over and used by the Government perhaps for years, to say that because such railroad had no operating income for certain years in the past nothing would be due it for use in the future. But such arrangement added to the other provision for compensation will result in largely increasing the amount the Government will be compelled to pay for the use of the roads. The $950,000,000, which represents the operating income of those that had an operating income, will be absorbed, of course, and the Government will be compelled to pay to those which had no operating income during the three-year period what would be a "just compensation" for the use of their roads.

But the inequality does not stop there. There will be many cases where an operating income was received, but where it was too small to constitute what would be "just compensation." This, too, would have to be arranged so that the operating income guaranteed would be augmented by further payments from the Treasury.

It must be evident that only those roads will be satisfied with the operating income which received an excessive or large return during the test period. In the very nature of things the amounts paid will be unequal upon any fair estimate, and to that extent unjust.

LITIGATION AND DELAY.

I think we all realize that every effort should be made in arranging for compensation to avoid litigation and delay. The Government can only offer what it considers a just compensation, and such offer may be accepted or rejected by any particular railroad as it may deem the offer advantageous or otherwise. It is manifest that any railroad which realizes that another railroad will receive a disproportionate compensation will not be satisfied if it shall receive less. The more inequalities that exist, the more dissatisfaction and consequent litigation there will be. It would be hard to conceive of any place of payment that would create more inequalities. It may, therefore, be anticipated that much litigation will result. Either that or the dissatisfied roads will be consoled with generous or excessive payments.

NO INCENTIVE FOR EFFICIENCY.

One of the strongest grounds of condemnation against the method of compensation proposed in the bill is that it gives no incentive for wise management and good service, but, on the contrary, will encourage indifference and inefficiency.

It is not proposed, nor would it be possible at this time, for the Government in taking over the railroads to substitute Government officials as officers to manage the railroads, nor to make the employees of the railroads the employees of the Government. The management of the direct and practical operation of the railroads will remain in the hands of the same men who were in charge before the Government assumed control. The president and general managers and boards of directors will continue as usual. But why should they worry? Their stockholders are satisfied, because their stock has been made as good or better than a Government bond. Their dividends are guaranteed by the Government. The railroads are to be maintained and improved with additions, extensions, and betterments from the Treasury of the United States. It makes no difference what their income may be, the railroads are assured an income during the entire period of Government occupancy, the most generous they have ever received.

Business may fail, panics may come, depression rest like a pall over the land, the effects of the war may ruin half of the enterprises of the country, still the prosperity of the railroads can not fail, for the Government insures them not only against loss, but gives them the largest profit ever recorded in the history of transportation. Without effort on their part, without diligence, without efficiency, no matter how managed, no matter whether good service is rendered or not, they are insured protection, preservation, and a handsome return as long as the Government remains in control. If it were desired to afford an opportunity to discredit Government control or ownership no better plan could be devised than the one proposed in the bill.

WHAT THE AMENDMENT WOULD DO.

Several propositions for agreed compensation, as substitutes for the one contained in the bill have been suggested. The one contained in my amendment is submitted, not as the best but as a better and more defensible method of compensation than the one contained in the bill. The only completely defensible method of determining "just compensation" would be an agreement if it could be arranged, in each particular case, based on the conditions applicable to that particular case. In default of such agreement provision should be made for determining the amount by a proceeding in the courts. That has been the usual course adopted by the Government in the condemnation of private property for public use. It is claimed, and there is ground for the claim, that if such method were adopted at this time it would result in much uncertainty and delay. It is generally believed that it is best under existing circumstances to offer to the railroads such a fair proposition as will afford no reason or excuse for refusal. But it is easy to go too far in that regard. We would not be justified in offering greatly excessive compensation in order to induce the railroads to accept quickly.

The amendment which I submit offers to the railroads payment in full of the interest on their bonded indebtedness as it shall become due during the period of Federal control; it offers to pay the usual and customary dividends to the stockholders; it offers to carry out fully all the other guaranties contained in the bill, such as the payment of taxes, the cost of operation and maintenance, and to return the railroads in as good condition as when received. If there is any surplus it is to be equally divided between the railroads and the Government.

Such a plan if adopted could not be objected to as unfair. It would not base the principal item of compensation upon the returns of a past period. It would provide the railroads should share in whatever of prosperity or adversity the future has in store.

Mr. SNOOK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. I will.

Mr. SNOOK. Does the gentleman believe that under the amendment he proposes the railroads would enter into a voluntary agreement with the Government?

Mr. TOWNER. I should think so. Why not? It is a fair basis of agreement, even a generous basis. It would stabilize their securities by insuring the payment of interest. It would pay their customary dividends. It would secure them against loss or depreciation. It would divide the excess received and thus add to the surplus of the roads. If they would consult their own interests that ought to be enough to induce them to accept such an offer. If they are asking more they would be asking the unreasonable and the unjust.

Mr. SNOOK. Has the gentleman read the hearings, in which their representatives said before the committee they would not accept such an offer?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; I have read the hearings, but I think no such proposition was presented to them as is contained in my amendment.

Mr. SNOOK. Is not the gentleman's amendment along the line of that offered by Mr. Thorne before the committee?

Mr. TOWNER. I hardly think so. As I understand Mr. Thorne's proposition, it was to limit the compensation to be paid by the Government to 5 per cent above the guaranties.

The proposition I submit does not provide for the payment of excessive compensation. Especially would it prevent the payment to certain roads of the extravagant amounts which they would receive under the provisions of the bill.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. The gentleman proposes to pay the interest on the bonds of the railroads?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Is the gentleman aware that there are quite a number of railroads that have not paid any interest on their bonds for a long time? Would the gentleman's amendment pay the interest on the bonds of such roads?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; and the bill does the same. This is done to stabilize conditions and prevent litigation and loss.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the gentleman think that any railroad which has been making more than interest on its bonds would enter into a contract which in all probability would take away a part of its earnings in order to make up the deficit of some unprosperous roads?

Mr. TOWNER. I can hardly imagine such a condition. But certainly if the road was so weak it could pay only a surplus over interest on its bonded debt, it would gladly enter into a contract which would insure it against loss, put it on its feet, and build it up for future usefulness.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Where would it leave the railroads that have paid no dividends during the last three years, which have given the stockholders no returns.

Mr. TOWNER. It would leave them in better condition than they were.

Mr. WALSH. How?

Mr. TOWNER. While it would not pay dividends in cases where no dividends had been paid during the three-year period, it would pay their interest, build them up, and probably put them on a paying basis. The bill as it is provides for payment on the net operating income basis.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is not the gentleman incorrect as to what the bill provides? It provides that where the road has a net operating income, that is the standard; and if they have none, the President is authorized to make a special contract with them.

Mr. WALSH. Would that be permitted under the gentleman's amendment, if adopted?

Mr. TOWNER. The provision for payment on the net operating income basis would not prevail if my amendment is adopted, but the provision for taking care of exceptional cases would remain.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. There are a number of railroads—very substantial ones—that have expended their earnings on betterments and have declared small or no dividends. I have in mind the Illinois Central, one of the greatest roads in the country; one year they skipped the dividend and the next year paid only 2 per cent. I think the Chicago & Eastern Illinois has been in the hands of a receiver for three years and has paid no dividends.

Mr. TOWNER. Provision is made for that.

Mr. CANNON. I understand that provision was not made in such cases.

Mr. TOWNER. A subsequent provision of the bill which we have not yet reached gives the President power to arrange to pay just compensation in cases where by reason of "nonoperation, receivership, or any undeveloped or abnormal conditions" the amount would be inadequate. My amendment does not change that provision of the bill.

Mr. CANNON. In such case where dividends have not been paid the President has the discretion to make a proper allowance?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; that is true in any exceptional case where by the method contained in the bill the amount is insufficient to constitute just compensation.

Mr. TILSON Is not the gentleman in error in that? It is net income and not dividends.

Mr. TOWNER. I will say to the gentleman that, whether the bill stands as it is or my amendment be adopted, in either case provision is made to take care of exceptional cases.

One of the features of the amendment that is especially advantageous as compared with the provision of the bill is that under the terms of the amendment there is an incentive to good service and efficiency. If the railroads are to secure a surplus over the guaranties they must work for it. It will require continual effort in order to secure the best results. Under the bill, as it is, the railroads will secure just as much under bad management as under good management. There is no incentive or reward for diligence or efficiency.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. As I understand the gentleman's amendment, it would guarantee all the roads that are taken over a sufficient amount to pay interest on their bonds, to pay their maintenance and operating expenses, and so forth. Is that correct?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; as far as it goes.

Mr. DEWALT. Let us take this instance: Railroad A has not made enough money to pay interest upon its bonds during the three-year period. Would the gentleman guarantee it payment of interest upon those bonds?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; and so does the bill.

Mr. DEWALT. The gentleman, therefore, would pay interest and dividends and operating expenses and maintenance of any railroad, whether it made any money or not?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; and that is what the bill does, except that instead of guaranteeing dividends, which amount to about $300,000,000 yearly, the bill gives the railroads, besides the guaranties, about $550,000,000 for dividends and surplus.

Mr. DEWALT. Then the gentleman would not discriminate between a railroad that is well managed and one that is badly managed?

Mr. TOWNER. Oh, yes.

Mr. DEWALT. Wait one moment, I am coming to the logical conclusion of the gentleman's proposition.

Mr. TOWNER. I beg the gentleman's pardon, but he is omitting one of the most important factors. My proposition guarantees the payment of interest on the bonded indebtedness, the other guarantees before mentioned, the customary dividends, and then, if there is any surplus, provides it shall be divided between the Government and the railroads. That is an incentive to good management and general efficiency. There is something to work for. Under the bill, as you present it, there is nothing to work for. You guarantee the railroads the largest returns ever received, no matter what they do. You thus pay a premium for negligence on the part of railroads for not doing their duty, for allowing them to run into bankruptcy. You, in effect, say to the roads, "No matter what you do, how you may run the road, or what you may do to the people who use it, we will guarantee you the profits you have made during the three most prosperous years of your history." That I believe to be not just, but unjust compensation.

Mr. Chairman, we all must realize that in this legislation we are without the benefit of past experience to guide us. Under ordinary circumstances we can correct mistakes made by repeal or modification. But this legislation is peculiar in this, it provides for the making of a contract between the Government and the several railroads, which, if made, is binding during the entire period of the contract. It can not be abrogated or changed except by agreement. If we now guarantee to pay an excessive and in some cases exorbitant compensation we will be bound by our agreement. To so bind the Government would be unfair to the people who in the last analysis must pay the compensation. It is our duty as their Representatives to protect their interests.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I hope that this amendment will not be adopted, but I have had my hopes blasted so often that. I am afraid to take even a chance on it. This proposition will change the whole scheme of the bill from beginning to end and be equivalent to a new bill, which has not been passed on in the House or in the Senate or anywhere else, and will provide for the payment of interest and dividends as full and complete compensation for the use of railroads. The dividends paid by a railroad depend entirely upon the action and judgment of the directors of the road. They may pay no dividends, but may keep all of the returns for surplus.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. The gentleman says that it depends entirely upon the dividends. The gentleman has not read my amendment carefully.

Mr. SIMS. That may be true. I did not get it until a few minutes ago.

Mr. TOWNER. Because it provides that the railroads shall receive all of the guaranties that are contained in this bill and interest upon their bonded indebtedness, the customary dividends that have been declared, and then that they shall share one-half of the amount received above that.

Mr. SIMS. The dividends, of course, are what the several directors in the last three years have ordered paid. A conservative railroad that is receiving a large net operating income may have ordered dividends paid to the extent of 4 or 5 or 6 per cent and have retained 4 or 5 or 6 per cent as a surplus for railroad purposes. This amendment will provide that that railroad which has done what every good railroad ought to do, which has not skinned its resources in the way of dividends, shall receive during Federal control a dividend not in excess of that which it paid out, whereas a railroad that has skinned its resources and paid out a dividend out of proportion to its welfare shall receive from the Government a sum equal to the dividend paid out, which ought not to have been paid out—in other words, which were paid out for the purpose of kiting their stocks or giving them a market value. To do that they have paid out dividends that ought never to have been paid under good management. You are going to force the Government to take them over for war purposes and continue during the Federal control to pay a dividend according to the standard of the payment made before that ought not to have been paid, made by interested parties for the indirect purpose of advancing the credit of the railroad, for stock-jobbing purposes, rather than in preparing the railroad to discharge its duties to the public in the best and most efficient way. I do not deem that it is necessary to go into any further details about this amendment. The railroads are entitled to the surplus that they honestly earn and can make such disposition of it as they see proper. They can pay it out in dividends or may make any other use of it that may be necessary to enhance the operating efficiency of the road, and they are entitled to these net earnings, if they are entitled to any, and we should not, as I think, provide a contract that none except the railroads which have not conducted their affairs in the best way will take advantage of and foreclose others and let them go to the courts and get what they can in that way rather than sign a contract.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I have been unavoidably absent for the last hour or two and have not kept up with these amendments. What I do not know about the bill probably might make a small volume. I do not know that I thoroughly understand the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] wherein if adopted it changes the provisions of the bill; but I would like to know whether the bill or the amendment would cover, in justice, roads like several I have in mind. Let us take the Chicago & Eastern Illinois, for instance, running from Chicago to Evansville, from Chicago to St. Louis, with some feeders. It is one of the best roads of my knowledge, and yet owing to a combination of circumstances, having closed out to the Frisco, and having had to take the road back, the result has been that they have not paid interest upon their bonds, nor have they paid dividends upon their stock. Since it went into the hands of a receiver the road has been put in very good condition, stations have been constructed, and it is almost ready to go out of the hands of the receiver, and would under ordinary conditions. I speak of that as one kind of road. There are many other roads that went into the hands of receivers because they failed to pay their fixed charges. Now, I would be glad to know how this bill affects such roads or how the gentleman's amendment changes it so as to affect such roads.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I will answer in the time of the gentleman from Illinois——

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. The bill provides for just such a case as the gentleman has referred to, that the President may authorize dividends to be paid where they have not been heretofore paid and that where the standard return of three years will be plainly unjust and inequitable to any railroad company, that then he will pay such just compensation as the facts and circumstances connected with the road warrant.

Mr. CANNON. Does the amendment change the bill?

Mr. SIMS. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa, I understand, would not apply to such case as that, from the fact that no dividends having been paid his amendment does not apply, and it would have to go under section 3 for other compensation.

Mr. CANNON. Nor would they receive anything, I will say, under the terms of the bill in the case mentioned.

Mr. SIMS. They would receive just compensation for the use of the road during the time of such use.

Mr. TOWNER. My amendment would not affect the provision.

Mr. SIMS. I do not think so. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I am not entirely clear that the amendment offered by my colleague is so worded as not to include more than he desires, but I am entirely clear that the compensation provided for in this bill with reference to roads that have been highly successful and profitable is altogether too large and an amount that ought not to be allowed under any circumstances. I have been surprised during the course of this debate to hear repeated statements—in one instance from a member of the committee—to the effect that the three years, whose average was going to be taken as a basis for this allowance, were three lean years. It is true that 1915 was a lean year, but the three years that are taken as a basis for compensation in this case are, when averaged, the three most prosperous years that have occurred in succession—in fact, the three most prosperous years that they have had in the last 20 years.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Nobody is claiming that 1917 was a lean year, nor 1916.

Mr. DEWALT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will.

Mr. DEWALT. Just to give proper information.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I have here the figures of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. DEWALT. So have I here.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Lying right on the desk before me, and I know what I am talking about.

Mr. DEWALT. Let us see. Class 1 railroads, which are railroads earning over a million dollars, 1917, net income $1,020,800,000; 1916 it was $948,872,959; 1915, which they call a lean year, $683,104,833; so the gentleman certainly must be incorrect when he stated any member of this committee urged that we took three lean years as an average.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It has been stated here several times.

Mr. SIMS. Oh, no; the gentleman is mistaken; not by members of the committee.

Mr. DEWALT. Either the gentleman's hearing is defective or he was not here when members of the committee spoke.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania himself, if he will look over his remarks he will find that he will want to correct them.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Was not the statement made that the three years was the leanest years for 18 years back?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That was the statement to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania acceded, and I called attention to it at the time.

Mr. DEWALT. Of any three-year period during the last 18 years this is the lowest average period. That is correct.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. These three years?

Mr. DEWALT. That these three years, taken together, the average is lower than any three-year period.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is entirely wrong, and I will insert in connection with my remarks, if I may be permitted to extend them, a table prepared by the Interstate Commerce Commission, which will show that the gentleman is entirely incorrect. I hope he will read it.

Now, what are the facts in relation to those three years? They show a higher percentage of operating income to investment of any three years in succession for the last 20 years. I am going back further by two years so there can be no misunderstanding about it. The gentleman is merely repeating the mistake he made before, and to which I was endeavoring to call his attention. They also show the highest average revenue per mile of track that has ever been shown and the highest average operating income for the train-mile.

Mr. BURROUGHS. Net or gross?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The operating income after taking out all expenses for maintenance and everything of that kind, and they show, of course, by far the largest total income; in fact, the income for 1916 or 1917, as far as total income is concerned, is about three times what it was in 1890. Yet we are taking those three years which, even counting in the lean year of 1915, presents such an exceptional situation, and we propose to allow compensation in accordance with the average of those three years. I say that this will allow those successful railroads around $150,000,000 to $200,000,000 per annum in excess of what they ought to receive.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will.

Mr. TILSON. How does the gentleman determine what they ought to receive? Are they not entitled to receive what the property is worth, what the use of the property is worth, at the time of its taking, which was a very valuable time, 1917?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more, and I will answer the gentleman and some other gentlemen who have spoken.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. So many gentlemen have spoken comparing the railroad property with ordinary property that I am sure they spoke thoughtlessly with reference to it. In ordinary times a man can charge what he desires with reference to the products of the farm. A merchant may charge what he wishes for the goods he has in his store, but the corporation that is operating a public utility has no right to fix its charges at whatever it wishes. It can only charge a reasonable rate, and the Government has the right to limit it to reasonable rates and reasonable compensation.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Were not these returns for the three years to which the gentleman has referred to based upon the returns made under rates fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. So that so far as that was concerned they did not charge what they wanted, but they charged what the Interstate Commerce Commission permitted them to charge?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes; but what is the application?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Now, is it not also true, in reference to the gentleman's statement that the fixing of future charges should not be based on these excessive years, that we are still in war and we are liable to have excess business and are to have excess business during the period the Government is operating these roads?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not know that that will be the case or not. I do not see the application of it, but the gentleman is making an argument in my time instead of letting me make the argument.

It is true these rates were fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission at what was supposed to be reasonable. They were so fixed, however, because it was necessary in order to make a rate under which roads not so well situated could operate and to put the rates on an equality all over the country where the railroads operated between the same places. Now, we have here an entirely unreasonable proposition when you consider that a corporation like the Burlington Railroad, that will receive 22 per cent on its invested capital, and other corporations will be allowed from 12 to 14 per cent. In the case of other railroads mentioned here the returns are very much larger than the figures last mentioned.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Now, the total operating returns which the President is authorized to pay out is the sum of the return for three years—about $950,000,000. Is not that true?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The average for three years?

Mr. MADDEN. The total of the average would be $950,000,000?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. About that.

Mr. MADDEN. Per year?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Per year.

Mr. MADDEN. Under this bill he would be authorized to make contracts with the Burlington Road, earning 22 per cent, or some other road earning 50 per cent, for a 15 per cent payment if they were willing to make that contract, and he will be able then to make a contract with some other road that was not earning anything to pay it something as long as he kept within the bounds of the total amount he was authorized to pay? Is not that true under the terms of this bill?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Possibly so, but I do not see what my friend is coming to. I intended to yield only for an inquiry.

Mr. MADDEN. The point I wanted to ask the gentleman was if under these circumstances he was able to make such a contract would it not be possible for him to restrict the payment to the roads earning large dividends and make larger payments to the roads earning smaller dividends, and thus equalize it? The thing is that he has to do with $950,000,000 only.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not think that is entirely correct, although it was in accordance with the statement of some of the gentlemen of the committee, and in this connection I want to call their attention to another matter. Some gentlemen have said, where the railroads have no operating income, that in such case the President could provide for the payment of the interest on the bonds and other necessary expenses. I do not so understand the bill. The bill provides that a different compensation may be agreed upon in exceptional cases, but I have not understood that an exceptional case meant a case where a road for years has no operating income and has not been able to pay interest on its bonds. If that is the construction placed on this bill, I do not think I shall vote for it.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not think anybody in the committee has suggested that the bill authorized the President where there was no operating income in the three years to guarantee dividends or interest on indebtedness. But manifestly where there is no income for that period there is no basis for a standard return. Therefore, the President must enter into a contract based upon some other compensation. If they could not make the contract, of course the Government would not take over the nondividend and noninterest paying road and use it without compensation; and in that case they can go before the Court of Claims or before the boards of arbitrators referred to in the bill.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Does the gentleman mean to say that all the nondividend and noninterest paying roads are going to be taken over under this bill and the interest on their bonds is going to be paid?

Mr. BARKLEY. No; that is contrary to what I say. But if the amendment now pending is agreed to, that is what will happen. It will put an inflated value on the stock of every railroad that is not paying interest on its bonds.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I am not arguing with the gentleman on that point.

I append to my remarks the tables to which I referred. In column (e) of the first table will be found the per cent of income to investment for all the railroads of the United States from 1881 to 1917, inclusive. I should like to have some gentleman find three years in succession whose average equals 1915, 1916, and 1917. In column (a) will be found the operating income, which is used as a standard in this bill. Find, if you can, any three years in succession whose average approaches 1915, 1916, and 1917. In column (b) is found the income per mile of track, just as I stated. The other table supports my statements with reference to income per train-mile.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report. The Chair understood that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] did not desire to press the point of order.

Mr. BARKLEY. No. I simply reserved it in order to look into it.

The CHAIRMAN. The record will show that the point of order was withdrawn. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LENROOT: Page 3, line 5, to page 4, line 2: Strike out the whole paragraph and insert: "Every such agreement shall provide that all taxes assessed for the period of Federal control—which but for such Federal control would, under the interstate commerce classification of accounts in force on December 27, 1917, be deducted from 'net income from railway operations' in determining 'railway operating income'—shall, except as hereinafter provided, be paid from operating revenue, or if that is insufficient for the purpose then from the revolving fund created by this act. That if Federal control begins or ends during the tax year for which any taxes may be assessed the taxes for such year shall be apportioned to the date of the beginning or ending of such Federal control, and the foregoing provisions shall apply only to that portion of such taxes which is due for the period of such tax year which falls within the period of Federal control; and that the owner shall pay from his own funds all other taxes, including the taxes under Titles I and II of the act entitled 'An act to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes,' approved October 3, 1917, or any act in addition thereto or in amendment thereof."

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, this proposed substitute of mine does not in any way change the intention, but it does change the procedure in some respects.

In the first place, it seems very clear that there ought to be a simple provision, so far as taxes are concerned, providing that as to taxes that if the roads were still under private control would be paid out of operating revenue, would continue to be paid out of operating revenue during Federal control, whatever such taxes might be, and that all other taxes should be paid by the owner. My amendment makes that very clear, and so expressly provides.

In addition, as the language now stands, it seems to me that it is going to make great confusion in accounts. The taxes are assessed—the Federal taxes are assessed in the various internal-revenue districts—and this provides that if the carrier does not pay them they shall be charged against or deducted from the standard return. Why should not all taxes that under the present system are paid out of operating revenues continue to be paid in the district where they are assessed under Federal authority and paid to the internal-revenue collector? My amendment will accomplish that.

Then, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee a question with reference to special assessments, which it is provided shall be paid for wholly by the carrier. I want to ask him, because I do not know and I do not happen to have the schedule before me, whether special assessments now paid by railroads or a portion of those accruals are deducted in order to secure the net railway operating returns under the Interstate Commerce Commission classification? It is my recollection that they are, and that they are charged against capital account.

Mr. SIMS. Your amendment proposes to strike out everything on page 3, beginning with line 5?

Mr. LENROOT. My amendment will do this, if I may restate it: My amendment will have as a charge against operating revenues exactly the same taxes, other than war taxes, that have heretofore been paid out of operating revenues.

Mr. SIMS. My understanding is that—I do not remember the language of the bill—there will be no net return that will include taxes that have heretofore been paid before dividends or interest is paid.

Mr. LENROOT. Are taxes in the nature of special assessments now deducted in getting at the net railway operating income?

Mr. SIMS. I understand so.

Mr. LENROOT. This bill provides that they shall not be included. Now, I want to know where these municipalities are to be left that have levied special taxes against companies. In many cases we have a company where all tax provided is taken over by us. They have no cash resources in hand. They can not enforce the lien against the property. How are these municipalities going to get these special taxes under the bill as it now stands?

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman can see what the bill itself provides in that respect.

Mr. LENROOT. The bill provides that it shall not be paid by the Government.

Mr. SIMS. It says:

That other taxes assessed under Federal or any other governmental authority for the period of Federal control or any part thereof, either on the property used under such Federal control or on the right to operate as a carrier, or on the revenues or any part thereof derived fom operation (not including, however, assessments for public improvements or taxes assessed on property under construction, and chargeable under the classification of the Interstate Commerce Commission to investment in road and equipment), shall be paid out of revenues derived from railway operations while under Federal control; that all taxes assessed under Federal or any other governmental authority for the period prior to January 1, 1918, whenever levied or payable, shall be paid by the carrier out of its own funds, or shall be charged against or deducted from the standard return.

Mr. LENROOT. But the municipality has no lien that it can enforce against the property.

Mr. SIMS. The Government can pay it.

Mr. LENROOT. No; it can not do it. It expressly excludes it. It does not say who shall pay it.

Mr. SIMS. It will go out of the funds constituting the standard return.

Mr. LENROOT. That does not include the portion of the taxes that the Government shall pay, assessments for public improvements, and so forth.

Mr. SIMS. The railroad company will not receive these taxes in addition to the standard return.

Mr. LENROOT. This language in the bill now provides that certain taxes shall be paid out of revenues derived from operation. The gentleman says—and I think he is correct—that at present those special taxes are paid out of revenues derived from operation, although afterwards charged to capital account; but with the language in the bill the Government will not be permitted to pay such special taxes out of revenues derived from operation. And will not that leave the municipality absolutely helpless?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMS. I wish to read to the gentleman what is stated in the hearings as an interpretation of this provision of the bill as written. The gentleman will find it on page 883 of the hearings, by Mr. Anderson. He says:

I think we have now stated in a way that nobody can misunderstand that the ordinary taxes, Federal and State, and municipal and county, are to be paid by the Government and charged, as they now are, in operating expenses; that the war taxes are to come out of the standard return. And I may add that there is no reasonable possibility of there being any disturbance in the power of the State and subdivision thereof to proceed with taxation on the same general principles as hitherto. I put into this record, I think—I did in the Senate committee—the opinion of the chief counsel on that point. It was printed in your records, I believe.

Now, special assessments are just as much municipal and county taxes as are any other municipal and county taxes.

Mr. LENROOT. But the bill expressly provides that those taxes shall not be paid by the Government.

Mr. SIMS. That is, not paid at the loss and expense of the Government.

Mr. LENROOT. No, no——

Mr. SIMS. That is what it means.

Mr. LENROOT. Let me read the language of the bill.

On page 3, from line 5 to line 12, it is provided that the agreement shall provide that the railroads shall either pay the war taxes or the war taxes shall be deducted from the amount which the Government is to pay them.

Mr. SIMS. From their standard return.

Mr. LENROOT. From their standard return. That is all right. Then the bill goes on and says—

That other taxes assessed under Federal or any other governmental authority—

And, of course, that includes State and municipal—for the period of Federal control or any part thereof, either on the property used under such Federal control or on the right to operate as a carrier, or on the revenues or any part thereof derived from operation—

Now comes the language—

(not including, however, assessments for public improvements or taxes assessed on property under construction and chargeable under the classification of the Interstate Commerce Commission to investment in road and equipment), shall be paid out of revenues derived from railway operations while under Federal control—

That means that the Government will pay to these municipalities out of revenues all ordinary taxes——

Mr. SIMS. Will pay out of operating revenues.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. But this other will be paid exclusively out of what would otherwise go to the railroad as standard return.

Mr. LENROOT. No; because you provide what taxes shall be deducted from the standard return, and those are only the war taxes.

Mr. SIMS. It seems to me that it is as clear as it can be made. Now, the gentleman's amendment in reference to taxation provides for striking out the paragraph and inserting a new and longer paragraph. It does not change the amount of the taxes to be paid by the Government or the carrier, but merely undertakes to deal with the subject in detail, and instead of clarifying it, it complicates it. The contracts which will be made under section 1 will take care of taxation in exact accordance with the principle fully and clearly stated in the bill. The amendment is most undesirable.

Mr. LENROOT. My amendment provides for the payment out of operating revenue of all taxes that have heretofore been chargeable to operating revenue. I did not know, and that is why I asked whether special taxes heretofore have been chargeable to operating revenue, and the gentleman said yes.

Mr. SIMS. I mean paid out of operating revenue.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes. All right. Now, if that is true, there is no method in the bill by which municipalities can collect special assessments.

Mr. SIMS. They can collect them. The Government will pay them, but it will not pay them and then still pay the full standard return to the railroads.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman point out where in this bill there is any provision or permission to the Government to pay these special taxes?

Mr. SIMS. That is the only purpose and object of the contract authorized, and will be taken care of in the contract, and should be taken care of by such terms as each contract may make necessary; and to undertake to set out in detail every possible condition that may arise is only to complicate the contracting authorization.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LENROOT. I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LENROOT. I want to call attention to this, that we are dealing with the character of the contract, and in this language we say to the President, "You shall not agree that these special taxes shall be paid out of operating revenues."

Now, I admit that the carrier will be liable; but supposing the office of the carrier is in the city of New York and a municipality in the gentleman's district levies special assessments against a railroad and all the property of the railroad that there is in the gentleman's district is the property that has been taken over by the Government, how is the municipality going to enforce the payment of these special assessments?

Mr. HAMLIN. Does the gentleman refer to special taxes levied during the time that the roads are under Government control?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; certainly.

Mr. HAMLIN. Then I call attention to the last provision of the paragraph, following the parenthesis—shall be paid out of revenues derived from railway operations while under Federal control; that all taxes assessed under Federal or any other governmental authority—

Which would include municipal authorities, of course.

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. And then it says—for the period prior to January 1, 1918, whenever levied or payable, shall be paid by the carrier out of its own funds, or shall be charged against or deducted from the standard return.

Mr. LENROOT. That refers only to taxes assessed prior to the period of Federal control.

Mr. HAMLIN. Now I understand the question you raise is, What are you going to do with special taxes assessed during Federal control?

Mr. LENROOT. During Federal control. That is exactly the point.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think that parenthetical paragraph rather cuts it out.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. RUCKER. Suppose the language instead of reading—

Not including, however, assessments for public improvements—

Should read—

Including, however, assessments for public improvements?

Mr. LENROOT. I think they should be included, and then be a charge against the carrier as an addition to capital account.

Mr. RUCKER. If that language is amended by striking out the word "not" so that it will read—

Including, however, assessments for public improvements—

That would accomplish what the gentleman has in mind.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes. In fact, the words included in the parentheses ought to go out.

Mr. DEWALT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; if I have any time.

Mr. DEWALT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. DEWALT. If the gentleman from Wisconsin will return to page 2, lines 18 and 19, 20, 21, 22, and so forth, he will find this language:

In the computation of such income, debits and credits arising from the accounts, called in the monthly reports to the Interstate Commerce Commission equipment rents and joint facility rents, shall be included. The standard return and the cost of such additions, betterments, or road extensions are to be ascertained by the Interstate Commerce Commission from the reports, books, and other pertinent data—

And so forth. Now we come down to the gentleman's question, and he will notice how the extensions, betterments, or improvements are to be ascertained by the Interstate Commerce report—

(not including, however, assessments for public improvements or taxes assessed on property under construction, and chargeable under the classification of the Interstate Commerce Commission to investment in road and equipment)—

Now, the purpose of that phrase was to prevent an obligation being placed on the Government for assessment of taxes levied, if you please, by municipalities in the construction of the railroads during the time of Federal control. Evidently the purpose of that was to prevent municipalities exacting from the Government these excessive amounts—street paving and other things of similar character.

Now, you say, How shall it be collected? If it is a betterment or improvement of the railroad itself, then it is to be ascertained under the rules of the Interstate Commerce Commission under provisions of the foregoing section, and that is to be charged up against them in the standard return.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. DEWALT. I ask for one minute.

Mr. LENROOT. Is it not true that under the interstate-commerce classification special taxes are never included under the term of either betterments or improvements but are charged against capital direct? So it would not be covered by the language the gentleman states, because it being neither a betterment nor an improvement, it could not be taken into consideration by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. DEWALT. I do not agree with the gentleman at all; I do not think that is a reasonable construction. I think the foregoing part of section 1 clearly includes that.

Mr. LENROOT. May I ask the gentleman a further question?

Mr. DEWALT. Certainly; we are here for information.

Mr. LENROOT. If it is neither a betterment nor improvement under the interstate-commerce classification, and is charged against capital, how could it be included in the language the gentleman has just read?

Mr. DEWALT. The general provision as to betterments, extensions, and improvements—if the municipality by the construction of this road wanted to change the grade of a street, for instance, or if a municipality insisted on an underground passageway or an overhead passageway, they might assess a municipal tax against the railroad company while under Federal control. The Government, by the inclusion of the words in parenthesis, avoided that as far as possible, and contemplated in this bill, by the words heretofore quoted, that it might be included under the word "extensions," and therefore be deducted fairly from the standard return and decrease their emoluments to that amount.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert two other amendments to clarify the meaning of the bill and let them be disagreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to insert two amendments in the RECORD, with the understanding that those amendments be disagreed to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The amendments are as follows:

Page 4, after line 23, insert a new paragraph, to read as follows:

"Every such agreement shall also provide that each owner shall receive during the period of Federal control an annual sum equivalent to a fair percentage upon the cost of additions and betterments, less retirements and road extensions, made on or in connection with such railroad or system during the period of Federal control by the owner, with the approval or by the order of the President, plus a fair percentage upon the amount expended by the owner, during the period of Federal control, for taxes chargeable under the Interstate Commerce Commission classification of accounts in force on December 27, 1917, to investment in road and equipment, and for assessments for public improvements. Such fair percentage in the case of expenditures made out of borrowed money shall be equal to the rate at which such money is borrowed, and in other cases shall be fixed by the President at the time the expenditure is made. The cost of such additions, betterments, and road extensions, the amount of such retirements, and the amounts expended for such taxes and assessments shall be ascertained by the Interstate Commerce Commission and certified by it to the President. The amounts so certified shall, for the purpose of the agreement, be conclusive."

Page 4, after line 23 (and after the paragraph already inserted), insert a new paragraph, to read as follows:

"Every such agreement shall also provide that the United States will pay to the owner any loss accruing to such owner by reason of any additions, betterments, or road extensions, made during the period of Federal control by the President, or made during such period at the order of or with the approval of the President, by such owner, or by the person, corporation, partnership, or association, entitled to the possession, use, and control of the railroad or system of transportation at the time such additions, betterments, or road extensions are made. The amount of such loss shall be ascertained by the Interstate Commerce Commission and certified by it to the President. The amount so certified shall, for the purposes of the agreement, be conclusive."

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

"Provided, That no installment of standard return shall be paid to any carrier until the cost of any additions, repairs, renewals, and all improvements to and extensions of such carrier as may have been theretofore made during Federal control, and all taxes and the cost of such terminals, equipment, motive power, and cars as may have theretofore been provided by the President for such carrier during Federal control and not justly chargeable to the United States shall have been paid out of the operating income of such carrier during Federal control or shall have been paid by such carrier."

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I have no ambition to vie with the gentleman from Wisconsin in the number of amendments I offer, and this amendment may not seem, to some, to really be necessary in view of the language of the section, but, to my mind, something of this character ought to be provided. It is provided, in the first section of the bill, that the "standard return" shall be paid to the carrier in reasonable installments. My amendment would provide that the carrier should receive no installment of "standard return" so long as there is any amount due the Government from the carrier by reason of improvements, extensions, equipment, taxes, or other debts which the Government has incurred on behalf of the carrier.

In other words, when the time for releasing Government control arrives, the Government will not be in the position of having permitted the carrier to receive installments of "standard return," and yet at the time of final settlement be indebted to the Government in large sums for improvements, equipment, taxes, and other charges; and I do not believe that, so far as the Government has reinvested in the property of carriers the funds which it receives from income, that the shareholders ought to be allowed to receive any dividends in the way of installments from "standard return"——

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman include the $500,000,000 revolving fund that this bill appropriates as a part of the fund that shall be expended out of the standard return, against which there shall be no payments to the railroads?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Oh, no; not at all. It would not affect the $500,000,000 fund at all, because that fund is simply provided for the use of the Government in making these expenditures when it has not those funds already at hand from operating income; and when the funds have been expended from the $500,000,000 fund, it merely says that we will not pay to the railway companies on whose behalf those funds have been expended any portion of the standard return until the Government has been reimbursed for the funds it has expended.

Mr. MADDEN. That is for the $500,000,000?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. No; for any fund.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman would not allow any dividends to be paid to any railway company in the United States until the investment made by the Government for equipment has been paid back?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. By that particular railway.

Mr. MADDEN. That would include the $500,000,000.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. There is a clause in the amendment which provides for any equipment or other charges not "justly chargeable to the Government"; and if out of that $500,000,000 the Government should buy equipment on its own account, it would not be chargeable to the railroad companies.

Mr. MADDEN. It would be in the end when we made the final adjustment.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. In the final adjustment it would, but it would remain the property of the Government until the final settlement was had, and that would in no way affect the amendment I have offered.

Mr. SNOOK. How would the gentleman decide as to an investment made in terminals or equipment? Would it justly be chargeable to the railroads or to the Government?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. In using that language I am using the language adopted by the committee, and I adopted it because the committee had already standardized that term.

Mr. SNOOK. The gentleman understands that there will be a large amount of investment made by the Government in terminals in taking care of war materials.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. My amendment says "for such carriers." If the Government did not expend the funds on behalf of the property of the carrier, it would build on its own account new terminals, and it would not apply, as was suggested by the gentleman from Illinois; and when final settlement should come, if the railway took over those terminals which have been erected by the Government, the settlement would be made at that time, and it would not affect the payments of the standard returns before that time.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. What does the gentleman do with the provision in the bill which states that the President may order and direct that betterments, improvements, extensions, and so forth, shall be made, and that motive power, if necessary, shall be bought, and that expense shall be deducted from the standard returns, first being paid by the President out of the operating expenses obtained and from the revolving fund? What is the solution of that problem?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The solution of that problem is that it does not affect that at all, except that you provide no time when the deductions shall be made.

Mr. DEWALT. Does the gentleman reason this way, that the United States Government, the fiscal department thereof, is going to be foolish enough to pay any road any amount when the road is actually in debt to the Government?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. If that is true, there can be no objection to my amendment, because we merely say in so many words what shall be done, which the gentleman from Pennsylvania imagines some Government official is going to do.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has that permission.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC 6. That the sum of $500,000,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, which, together with any funds available from any operating income of said carriers, may be used by the President as a revolving fund for the purpose of paying the expenses of the Federal control, and so far as necessary the amount of just compensation, and to provide terminals, motive power, cars, and other necessary equipment, such terminals, motive power, cars, and equipment to be used and accounted for as the President may direct and to be disposed of as Congress may hereafter by law provide.

The President may also make or order any carrier to make any additions, betterments, or road extensions, and to provide terminals, motive power, cars, and other necessary equipment necessary or desirable for war purposes or in the public interest on or in connection with the property of any carrier. He may from said revolving fund advance to such carrier all or any part of the expense of such additions, betterments, or road extensions, and to provide terminals, motive power, cars, and other necessary equipment so ordered and constructed by such carrier or by the President, such advances to be charged against such carrier and to bear interest at such rate and be payable on such terms as may be determined by the President, to the end that the United States may be fully reimbursed for any sums so advanced.

Any loss claimed to accrue to any carrier by reason of any such additions, betterments, or road extensions, terminals, motive power, cars, and other necessary equipment so ordered and constructed may be determined by agreement between the President and such carrier; failing such agreement the amount of such loss shall be ascertained as provided in section 3 hereof.

From said revolving fund the President may expend such an amount as he may deem necessary or desirable for the purchase, construction, or utilization and operation of canals, boats, barges, tugs, and other transportation facilities on the inland, canal, and coastwise waterways, and may in the acquisition, operation, and use of such facilities create or employ such agencies and enter into such contracts and agreements as he shall deem in the public interest.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to move a formal amendment. Page 8, line 19, I move to strike out the last word of that line, "necessary."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 8, line 19, strike out the word "necessary."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 9, line 15, strike out the words "purchase, construction, or"; strike out the word "Acquisition," in line 18, page 9; and, line 16, insert, after the word "canals," the following: "or for the purchase, construction, or utilization and operation of."

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, if the committee will observe the purport of this amendment, it will be noticed, in line 15, page 9, I strike out the words "purchase, construction, or," and in line 18 I strike out the word "acquisition," and after the word "canals," in line 16, I add the following: "or for the purchase, construction, or utilization and operation of." This amendment will make this bill correspond to the Senate bill. It will prevent the President from constructing canals or from purchasing canals. That is the purpose of the amendment. It seems to me that we have no time now to build canals or to buy canals. We ought not to buy canals, because we can take over the use of canals and use them during the war and until they are returned, and we ought to be content with the use rather than the purchase of expensive canals.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DILLON. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. For the purpose of information. Does the gentleman's amendment, if adopted, make this bill identical with the provision in the Senate bill?

Mr. DILLON. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Identical?

Mr. DILLON. Identical.

Mr. DEWALT. Will the gentleman yield? As I understand the amendment, it prevents the purchase and construction of canals?

Mr. DILLON. Exactly; certainly.

Mr. DEWALT. But it does not prevent the utilization and operation of canals?

Mr. DILLON. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DILLON. I will.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Would not the same effect be attained, but more simply, by striking out the word "canals," so that it would read:

The President may expend such an amount as he may deem necessary or desirable for the purchase, construction, or utilization and operation of—boats, barges, tugs, and other transportation facilities on the inland, canal, and coastwise waterways.

And now strike out the word "canals"—

That was the way it was before, by mistake, the word "canals" was put in there. I understood Mr. ANDERSON to agree that the word "canal" should go in the next line, "on the inland, canal, and coastwise waterways." I think, by mistake, the word "canals" was also inserted at the beginning of line 16, and I think it would be much more simple to strike it out.

Mr. DILLON. The gentleman would reach the same result; but I seek to make it correspond to the Senate bill. We ought not to engage in the work of digging these canals at this time. We need 250,000 additional men in the shipping yards to help build ships. We need men on the farms. I had a letter to-day from one of my constituents—a farmer—saying that he had entered into an agreement to pay a laborer on his farm $1,250 for a year's labor upon his farm. The farmers in my district can not get enough farm labor at any price. We have no time to dig canals; labor is too expensive and too scarce. We ought not to buy canals when we can get the use of them by paying for that use. I ask for a vote on my amendment.

Mr. DECKER rose.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri desire recognition in opposition to the amendment?

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Chairman, I wanted to ask the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. DILLON] a question if all his time has not expired.

Mr. DILLON. My time is not all gone, and I will yield.

Mr. DECKER. Under your amendment would it allow still the purchase or construction of boats, barges, and other means of transportation?

Mr. DILLON. Yes. It allows the purchase of all of those facilities. My amendment only eliminates the digging of canals and the purchasing of canals.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer an amendment to the amendment. My amendment is to strike out the whole paragraph.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DILLON. My amendment goes to the perfection of the text and therefore should have the preference.

The CHAIRMAN. That would be disposed of first, and then the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] would be in order.

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not want to be heard on the amendment of the gentleman from South Dakota, but I want to be heard on my own.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire recognition at this time or after the vote is taken?

Mr. FORDNEY. After the vote is taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. DILLON].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 56, noes 2.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to strike out the entire paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. FORDNEY: Page 9, lines 13 to 20, inclusive, strike out the paragraph.

Mr. FORDNEY. I offer this amendment for the reason, gentlemen, that there is nothing in the proclamation of the President relating to inland canals. The appointment of the Director General, Mr. McAdoo, has no reference to the control of inland canals. I read from the proclamation itself:

It is hereby directed that the possession, control, operation, and utilization of such transportation systems hereby to be undertaken shall be exercised and undertaken through William McAdoo, who is hereby appointed and designated Director General of the Railroads.

He has not been appointed Director General of the inland canals. The President has not signified his desire to have the Government take over the canals in any respect; that is, the inland waterway canals. He has the power under existing law to take the coastwise boats; not those under inland waterways. He has the right to commandeer all ships on the Great Lakes or on salt water, but has expressed no desire whatever to control the boats on the inland canals.

Mr. ESCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. ESCH. I think it may be included under this:

Located wholly or in part within the boundaries of the continental United States, and consisting of railroads and owned or controlled systems of coastwise and inland transportation.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; I say that under existing law I believe the President has the right to take inland-waterway transportation, which does not mean canals. It means the boats on the Great Lakes and in the coastwise trade on the high seas. I believe the President has already commandeered such boats as he thought proper that were engaged in the coastwise trade. That order has been issued by the President, has been issued for some time past, if I am correct in my understanding of the matter. To leave this paragraph as modified by the amendment of the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. DILLON] perhaps would remove the sting in this bill, but to leave that paragraph in the law as it is written now in the bill means that the Government of the United States is expected to purchase some of those canals. We have one canal here on the Potomac River that is now dry, with not even good fishing in it. But to authorize the President of the United States to take over all the canal boats and the mules and equipment in connection with them is the greatest absurdity. The President makes no such request and should be given no such power, and I hope the amendment that I have just offered to strike out that paragraph will be adopted.

Mr. DEMPSEY and Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York desire to oppose the amendment?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I desire to oppose the amendment; yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not think there is the difference which the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] points out between inland means of communication by water. I think that it does cover canal transportation, and I think that it would not take in the kind of transportation to which the gentleman refers—small, worn-out canal boats drawn by mules. But I can point to an important line of transportation which it would take in and which would benefit the gentleman's State and all the Western States and help cure the transportation difficulties that we are now facing. The State of New York has constructed, at an expense of nearly $200,000,000, a great inland transportation system reaching from Lake Erie down to the Hudson River. It has made that a barge canal. The work is just completed. It is ready for operation. We have this congestion throughout the United States; we have it at New York and we have it all the way across the continent—freight piled up and the railroads unable to transport it—and yet this great inland transportation system has not been utilized at all.

The State of New York, at its own expense, has created this great canal. Why should not the United States in this emergency place boats upon it and utilize it, so that grain and lumber and coal can come down from Michigan and other States to Buffalo and there be transported over the Erie Canal in boats, which we have not to-day, and which can be built in these various shipyards which we are to-day constructing? Why should we not provide boats for the Erie Canal as well as boats for crossing the ocean and boats for the various lakes? Why should we not utilize that means of transportation?

We are seeking to-day to solve the transportation problem. We have three trunk lines across the State of New York, and they are not able to handle anything like all the traffic. We would in a great measure be able to handle it and in great measure solve that problem if we had a fleet of boats plying to the capacity of the canal between New York and Buffalo. So I say this is a wise provision. This particular provision should stay in the bill. This is a case where the Government should step in and supplement the work which the great State of New York has done out of its own funds, as no other State in the Union has done, in contributing to the general weal. [Applause.]

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, something was said about the President not taking over the water systems. I read from the proclamation just this sentence:

By subsequent order and proclamation, if and when it shall be found necessary or desirable, possession, control, or operation may be taken of all or any part of such street railway systems, including subways and tunnels, and by subsequent order and proclamation possession, control, and operation in whole or in part may also be relinquished to the owners thereof of any part of the railroad systems or rail and water systems, possession and control of which are hereby assumed.

Showing that by proclamation they have assumed possession.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the gentleman proceeding for 10 minutes; but, if he does, I want five minutes in which to answer. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have one minute. I wonder if the gentleman would allow me one minute?

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will pardon the Chair for a moment, the Chair would state that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] is a member of the committee, and under the rule is entitled to priority of recognition. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I have nothing to do except to give the House information. I know that a great many railroads own canals. Some use them and some do not, but they are a part of their systems. The Lehigh Valley Railroad owns the Morris Canal and the Lehigh River Canal, which ought to bring coal down to New York. The Pennsylvania Railroad owns and uses quite fully the Delaware & Raritan Canal, which takes coal and other materials from Philadelphia to New York and relieves the strain upon the railroads. This is also true in connection with the canal that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] speaks of so much, which used to run a line of steam packet boats to New York through the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal and through the Delaware & Raritan Canal, because on the Delaware & Raritan Canal we have locks, but no bridges that are not drawbridges.

The operation of those canals and their use are just as important in running the railroads to which they belong and for the help of those railroads as is the actual operation of the railroads themselves, and I hope, therefore, that this paragraph will not be stricken out.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Is it not a fact that up to the time the railroads became congested, up to the time that they reached the point where they could not handle the traffic of the country, for a series of years they lowered their rates wherever they paralleled a canal to such a degree that they drove the boats on the canal out of business and left the waterways bereft of any means of transportation?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I do not know that. What I do know is that on some of the waterways they did not supply enough boats. They needed special boats. I also know that the Chesapeake & Ohio Canal, which comes down from Cumberland to this city, might be used to bring coal down here if they had enough boats and appliances. I do not know whether the canal belongs to a railroad company or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] is recognized, and asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], whom I esteem highly in all other things, has taken up the cudgels for the railroads in this instance, I fear, and is against having any competitive means of transportation. If he succeeds in striking out this paragraph, there can be no other interpretation of his attitude.

The President of the United States has indicated that he proposes to take over the needful waterways of this country along with the railroads. They are a part of our transportation system. Unless, as the gentleman from Michigan proposes, all transportation hereafter shall be carried over the railroads and the railroads only, then this paragraph must remain in the bill. If the gentleman would continue the congestion there has been in the country and would stay the progress of the war, he will strike out this paragraph, and you will do so who vote with him. He states that the President has not indicated his intention to take over the waterways. We gave the President full authority to take over any transportation system when we passed the act of August, 1916, and the President in his proclamation taking over the railroads indicated that he proposed to take over the waterways, too. I will read a paragraph of the President's proclamation, which the gentleman from Michigan evidently has not read, in which the President stated that—

> By subsequent order and proclamation, possession, control, and operation in whole or in part may also be relinquished to the owners thereof, or any part of the railroad systems, or rail and water systems, possession and contol of which are hereby assumed.

I am for the taking over of the waterway systems along with the railroads in the time of war, and yet I am in favor of giving the railroads every possible opportunity to rehabilitate themselves under the presidential control. I am for the taking over of the railroads and the retention of this paragraph, because I want a decent competition in order to relieve the transportation congestion of this country, both in war times and in normal times. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], with some little unction, indicates that this is not the correct thing to put in a bill of this kind. He indicates that the purchase of canals may not be the correct thing to advocate. Why, the gentleman from Michigan comes from a State in which they have a Government-owned and a Government-controlled canal upon which this Government has spent, together with its other waterways in Michigan, upward of $60,000,000 down to the present time. It takes nerve on the part of any gentleman from Michigan to come in here and attempt to stop the wheels of progress or of war by checking the waterways in other sections of the country just because his State has got what it wants. [Applause.]

The trouble with the average gentleman who opposes waterway development is that he has got what he wants out of the Treasury of the United States and wants to prevent anybody else from getting what he wants. We are not going to fight the battles of this country, my dear friend from Michigan, up along the Great Lakes. The marvel to me is that we have not already been engaged in battle along the Atlantic coast. When that sea battle comes, it will not be on the Great Lakes. You are too friendly with Canada, just across the way. It will come along the Atlantic seaboard, and then when we want to proceed from the Boston Navy Yard to the navy yard at Brooklyn, when we want to get our smaller ships through the inside waterways, they will be blocked, because you have got your canal up in Michigan and we have not got ours along the Atlantic seaboard. [Applause.] When we want to put vessels from the Brooklyn Navy Yard down to the Philadelphia Navy Yard, where an inadequate canal marks the course to-day, you will be all right in Michigan, but we will be blocked down along the Atlantic coast. And so it will be when we want to pass vessels of the Navy and merchant ships, those carrying supplies and troops from the Philadelphia Navy Yard to the Norfolk Navy Yard; you have your canal in Michigan, paid for by the Government, but we have not got ours. And the sad point about it is that it is going to involve an expenditure of two and a half million dollars primarily against $60,000,000 in the Soo territory.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; I will yield; the gentleman is from Michigan.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. I am inclined to agree with the gentleman's purpose, but I would like to know where the canal is that the gentleman has spoken about.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The Soo Canal.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. It is not a Michigan canal; it lies between Michigan and Canada; but it is not a mule canal, similar to those which the gentleman is discussing.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is in the United States, and we took the money out of the Treasury of the United States to improve it. If the gentleman from Michigan and his colleagues would continue improvements along the Atlantic seaboard, it would have a greater war value than the Soo Canal. I want to say to you gentlemen on that side (the Democratic side) and some of you on this side (the Republican side), who have looked with some little interest upon this waterway project in times past, that the people on the other side of the water have been looking up the canal business a little more than they did before. I find that England, which is bisected, cut up, and gridironed with canals, which it permitted to waste to promote the railroads, just as we did here, has begun to take over and improve the canals, because it sees the wisdom of having a double means of getting troops and supplies and war materials back and forth. It now needs its canals to relieve the railroads.

Strike out this paragraph, and you strike out one of the real war features of this bill, one of the essential war features of this bill. Why, all your transportation trouble has been due to congestion at the port of New York. It has been the inability of the railroads to carry freight and troops, and yet now the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan proposes to prevent the President of the United States from utilizing waterways if he sees fit to do so, if the railroads are incompetent to carry the business of the country and accommodate the business of war.

I can not conceive of the mental attitude of the patriotic American citizen who is willing to spend $500,000,000 of the public money to bolster up the railroads of the country, already overburdened as they are, who refuses to the Director General of Railroads the right to take over a canal connected with a railroad or helpful thereto if he deems it necessary for the purposes of war. I would like to call your attention to the fact that some vessels have been going down on the Atlantic coast recently, and some barges have been going down, carrying coal because they could not get through the incompetent and inadequate inside passages. If they had been put to use, this coal shortage might not have happened.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pensylvania. I will.

Mr. MONTAGUE. This provision is not mandatory, but simply permissive.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is all. The Director General, out of the revolving fund of $500,000,000 which is to be plus such sums as may be provided in the War Finance Corporation act, is to assist the railroads and such waterways and canals as may be of service in time of war.

Gentlemen may smile when I talk about the Chesapeake & Ohio Canal, which leads from Cumberland to the city of Washington, and would be capable of serving States beyond. Would there have been a coal shortage in Washington if that canal had been open or if it had been utilized in fair weather? Some smart gentleman says he passed it the other day and saw no water in it. That gentleman typifies the ignorance of those who discuss the canal question. They do not know that canals were once our principal means of transportation. They are filled with water and work when the water is in, but the water is let out during the winter months. Gentlemen who believe in thrift would utilize these useful burden bearers during the 9 or 10 months of the year when they are workable and store up their supplies of coal. They would not depend upon them during the winter months when navigation is closed; that is the foolish policy.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it not possible that all of the coal necessary for the people of Washington and those in the environment of Washington—using this merely for illustrative purposes—might have been carried if during the summer months, during the working months, this old canal of yours had been opened up so that coal might be brought to Washington? I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. Can the gentleman give us any information as to how far the investigation has proceeded with reference to the purchase of the two canals, which investigation was authorized in the last river and harbor appropriation bill?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; an authorization was made in the last river and harbor appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Authorization was made in the last river and harbor appropriation bill for a survey of the Cape Cod Canal, which bisects Cape Cod and saves about 70 miles of outside sailing from the port of Boston to the port of New York, and provision was also made for the condemnation of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal, which links up Delaware Bay and Chesapeake Bay. Oh, if I could only take the Members of this House through that 13 miles of country which connects up the Chesapeake Bay and the Delaware Bay, and could induce them to look at the statistics and at the geographical conditions they would better understand the relation of that inadequate waterway to-day to the welfare of the Nation. How different the conditions would be when we came to discuss this question in the House. Yes; the river and harbor appropriation bill provides for a survey of the Cape Cod Canal. It provides for a condemnation of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal. Gentlemen talk about these canals as if they represented millions and billions of dollars, as if they were a graft on the Government. The Cape Cod Canal is only 8 miles long, but about Cape Cod in a period of 25 years, according to the statistics of the Government itself, there have been no less than 1,000 disasters involving thousands of human lives. Around the canal connecting up the Chesapeake and the Delaware Bay there is a tonnage to-day of upward of 50,000,000, ten times more, if this canal were opened and made adequate to accommodate it, than passes through the Panama Canal in a year. And yet you spend $400,000,000 on the Panama Canal and open it up for the benefit of the world, make the United States go through it on terms equal with any other nation, and then when we say to you, "Build your Kiel Canal down here at the Chesapeake and Delaware, put yourselves in position to have your fleet inside or outside, give yourselves an opportunity to go to a navy yard above or below or reserve to your ships ability to fight at either end," gentlemen rise and say it is going to cost too much; that it would actually be wasteful.

Some day, and I venture to say that some of us will live to see that day, men who oppose the opening of these natural arteries for protection, for defense, and for commerce, will regret having insisted upon their opposition to measures of this kind.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SWITZER. Will the gentleman please state the tonnage of the Delaware & Chesapeake Canal now?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is over 1,000,000 tons, on a depth of 10 feet, and it is nearly all war business; cotton from the South to go into the munition factories for purposes of war; lumber from the South to go into the construction of shipyards for the purposes of war—busy as can be, with unlimited tonnage asking passage, and all done on a 10-foot depth in small barges. The railroads need this help.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Is it not a fact that Germany has utilized her canals to great advantage in moving her troops and supplies?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Germany has utilized her canals and at all times with great advantage and profit to the Government, and Germany's canals have done as much to assist Germany in her success up to date in prosecuting her war as any other one agency. And yet we spurn the idea of putting our house in order as Germany has put her house in order. It is one of our national weaknesses.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentlman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Did not France do likewise, has she not also utilized her canals?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; France has used her canals and is building new ones, and England, another of those countries which like our own was indifferent to her own protection, has recently, through her Board of Trade, which is equivalent to a Department of Commerce, undertaken the development of her canals; she has taken them over for Government use and has coordinated them with the railroads and intends to use them to the full. Gentlemen, I urge you to retain this waterways paragraph in the bill. It is intended to give the President or the Director General discretion to take over any canal for war service if he needs it. It is not intended to purchase all of the canals of the country; that is preposterous, nor is there money enough, but it is the intention to enable the President or the Director General of Railroads to relieve congestion and facilitate transportation by taking over or improving for war purposes such workable canals and waterways as may serve the ends of the Government. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for 10 minutes, and I think I will not use more than half of that time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I never have, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] has just now done, imputed dishonest motives to any man who disagreed with me on any subject presented in this House. The gentleman from Pennsylvania stated that if I insisted on my motion in reference to the inland canals, that I must put myself in the attitude of a defender of the railroads. He intended that in an offensive manner, in my opinion. I have always regarded——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I did not intend to be offensive to the gentleman, but I said that if he struck out the right to use the waterways he left no alternative but the railroads.

Mr. FORDNEY. You meant exactly what you said, did you not?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I did not mean to be offensive to the gentleman, but I said what I have stated.

Mr. FORDNEY. You were offensive, as I took it, and I would not take that attitude toward you. I have a high regard for you and your fairness in dealing with the average man. I am opposed to Government ownership of railroads or canals, or any other great public utilities; and if I am correct in my statement the gentleman from Pennsylvania appeared before the committee and induced it to write that language in the bill which has been presented to the House. This provision was not in the original bill as introduced in the House. I take that from his own statement to me. The President of the United States did not ask authority to take over the inland canals of the country, I repeat; but when he does ask for such authority I will vote to give him such power if he can show me he needs them to carry to success this war; I will vote to give him all the power he wants and asks for, if it is necessary to aid in carrying on this war. I am just as patriotic as the gentleman from Pennsylvania dare be, or any other man.

I defy any man to show more patriotism in aiding the carrying on of this war and assisting the Government of the United States than I myself am showing. [Applause.] I am ready to give my money to the fullest extent of my ability, and I have aided the Government in giving two out of three sons [applause] to help in this great war. I feel hurt to think the gentleman would attempt to lead the Members of the House to believe that I am helping the railroads and am using my influence, whatever it may be here, in the interests of the corporations of the country, to the detriment of the administration in the carrying on this war. He compares the canals that he has been talking about with the Sault Ste. Marie Canal, the great canal connecting the Great Lakes—Lake Superior and the lower lakes—through which more tonnage goes each year twice over than through any canal in the world. Why, this inland waterway——

Mr. MADDEN. Over 80,000,000 tons; is not that so?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. You want to put a value upon that tonnage——

Mr. FORDNEY. Your little inland-waterway canal is not a flyspeck on the map of the world, compared with this great canal.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I know; but there is more value to it——

Mr. FORDNEY. What are you talking about? Nobody knows anything about your inland canal except the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Your tonnage is ore, ours is merchandise.

Mr. FORDNEY. I did not mean to be unkind to the gentleman; he is a very good friend of mine. [Laughter.] But, sir, the tonnage passing through the Soo Canal is not only iron ore, but consists of all kinds of merchandise. The State of Michigan has no canals to sell to the Government, as the State of Pennsylvania had railroads to sell to the Pennsylvania Railroad at one time, and statistics show that the State of Pennsylvania sold to the great railway system of Pennsylvania a railroad for seven and a half million dollars—twice its value but only 25 per cent of what it cost the State of Pennsylvania. Which one of the canals do you now want to sell the Government? Let me be just as sarcastic as you have been to me, but I do not wish to be——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The Government owns the Michigan canal, does it not, and paid for it?

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, but——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is all. The Government paid for it.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; and the Government paid for the Panama Canal, also. You have voted for every appropriation asked of the Congress to build that canal, have you not?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is true. I believe in it, and I believe in some other canals besides that one.

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman believes in some dinkey canal he wishes the Government to purchase. When the people of this country are contributing money in larger sums than ever before, and our Government is calling upon the people for money to carry on this great war in such stupendous amounts, he wants to sell some bankrupt canal to Uncle Sam——

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. We have not a mule canal.

Mr. FORDNEY. We have not any canals in the State of Michigan operated by mules. The canals in the State of Michigan are canals, not imitations. At the time we are taking over the railroads, there is but little competition between the inland canals (that are frozen up) and the railroads. My greatest objection to the paragraph has been cured by the amendment of the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. DILLON]. It takes the sting out of it, namely, the purchase of the canals.

And I say to my bosom friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], who doubtless has some Irish blood——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is true.

Mr. FORDNEY. And whatever blood there may be in me, I have lived with an Irish woman more than 44 years and maybe you think I can not fight. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman knows he can fight, but he always compromises as his wife desires. Therein lies the virtue——

Mr. FORDNEY. I never tried to make my wife love me by beating her. I have tried it with kindness every time, and I have succeeded every time, and every time I take her advice, I do the right thing. [Applause.]

Mr. ROMJUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. ROMJUE. Did you ask her views on this canal question?

Mr. FORDNEY. You ask her that question, and you will get an intelligent answer; but my good friend must not get excited and fly off the handle about canals in the State of Michigan. I do not want this Government to be put in a position where the President of the United States, through political influence, can purchase the mule canals, and then claim that he purchased them for the purpose of advancing the interests of this great Nation in carrying on this war with Germany 3,000 miles across the sea. That is what I do not want. I do not want any money lavishly spent by the Government of the United States, taken from the people at this time, when we are calling upon them for so much money, and used for any other purpose than is absolutely necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. LUNN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. All debate on this is exhausted.

Mr. LUNN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes, then.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CANNON. I understand that a pro forma amendment is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. That has been made and debated.

Mr. CANNON. Well, after all, another pro forma amendment can be offered, as I understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. Beyond the second pro forma amendment, as the Chair remembers the rule, we can not go. The Chair will look into the matter, however.

Mr. CANNON. Then let us vote on the pro forma amendment, if that is necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will look at the rule, and if in error the gentleman may offer it. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LUNN] has unanimous consent, and if the gentleman will permit him to proceed the Chair will look at the rule.

Mr. CANNON. I have no objection to the gentleman proceeding.

Mr. LUNN. Mr. Chairman, the controversy is not between the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY]. If, as the gentleman from Michigan has said, this particular paragraph was inserted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], I congratulate him on his wisdom.

New York State, with its important barge canal, should be able to carry millions of the tonnage that comes through the Great Lakes. I was going to ask the gentleman from Michigan whether he would not think that it was wise to aid in extending that tonnage on through the barge canal of New York State. The paragraph must be retained if the barge canal is to receive any assistance from this legislation. Barges for New York State are absolutely essential. At the present time, with the congestion on the railroads and elsewhere, we must do everything possible to aid transportation. I do not know of anything for the mileage involved between Buffalo and the Hudson River where greater increase of tonnage could be achieved than by assisting the barge canal of New York State. And I certainly hope for this reason that the particular paragraph will not be stricken from the bill. It is important. Its wisdom is shown from the fact that we are up against a transportation problem, and that every possible avenue for increase of tonnage ought to be utilized.

Mr. BAER. Is it not true that the State of New York has spent over $44,000,000 on the canal, and that they have not a barge running there yet? Is not the canal frozen up?

Mr. LUNN. Of course at the present time it is frozen up.

Mr. BAER. What is the tonnage on that canal now?

Mr. LUNN. They can carry 1,000-ton barges. The canal has just been completed at an expense of nearly $200,000,000. Some think that it is a greater engineering problem than the construction of the Panama Canal. It has been opposed resolutely and has been opposed continuously by the railroads. We have not, as the gentleman has suggested, the barges now that we need and which we should have, which would aid greatly the transportation of grain from the Northwest.

Mr. BAER. Do you believe that the railroads have tried to paralyze the transportation on that canal by not letting them build these modern barges?

Mr. LUNN. I believe they have done everything in their power to kill the whole canal project. They do not want the barge canal to be a successful competitor with the New York Central Railroad.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUNN. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. I wish to say to the gentleman from New York and to the House that, as I before stated, the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. DILLON] really takes the sting out of the paragraph, and so long as the paragraph only permits the President to lease or control, I intend to ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. LUNN. I am very glad to hear that, and I am sorry the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] was not here to help us keep the other portion in the paragraph, providing that the President could purchase or do anything necessary to increase the transportation, because, contrary to the gentleman from Michigan, I do believe in Government ownership of transportation facilities. That explains our difference of viewpoint.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I believe the President and the Director General of the Railroads will seriously take into consideration the use of these waterways, so necessary to competition.

Mr. LUNN. Yes; and I believe that will inure to the benefit of the whole country.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it not true that at one time the Erie Canal brought most of the grain from the Northwest?

Mr. LUNN. Yes; and, as I understand, at one time coal was transported from the Pennsylvania mines to the Hudson River, until the railroads, always at war with water transportation which they could not control, succeeded in having the particular canal abandoned.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment that I offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. If the committee will pardon the Chair for a moment, the Chair would like to make a brief statement. Paragraph 5 of Rule XXIII is as follows:

When general debate is closed by order of the House, any Member shall be allowed five minutes to explain any amendment he may offer, after which the Member who shall first obtain the floor shall be allowed to speak five minutes in opposition to it, and there shall be no further debate thereon, but the same privilege of debate shall be allowed in favor of and against any amendment that may be offered to an amendment.

At the end of that time the debate is exhausted. Now, the situation before the committee a few moments ago, when the Chair directed the attention of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LUNN] to the fact that the debate was closed, was this, as the Chair then thought and as he now thinks: The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] had offered an amendment. That had been debated for 10 minutes. The motion to strike out the last word or the last two words—the Chair does not remember which—of the former amendment had been debated for 10 minutes, and the mover of that did not withdraw or ask to withdraw his amendment. Therefore debate was exhausted under the rules of the House upon the amendment and the amendments thereto. The usual practice of the Chair is, after debate has been concluded upon a pro forma amendment, if the mover of that amendment does not himself ask to withdraw it, for the Chair to state "Without objection the pro forma amendment is withdrawn." That would have been done in this case. The debate was exhausted under the rule of the House.

Mr. CANNON. It was subject to an amendment that was in order, namely, a substitute, which, however, was not offered, as that question is not before the Chair.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LENROOT. In the case the Chair put, the question that would be put, then, would be on the pro forma amendment, and if that was voted down, another pro forma amendment would be in order, and that would be open to debate?

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry connected with the ruling of the Chair, if the Chair will indulge me. The motion made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] was a motion to strike out. I take it that the pro forma amendment, the motion to strike out the last word, was in the nature of a perfecting amendment. That would take precedence of a motion to strike out; and an amendment to that amendment to strike out two words, as made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LUNN], would be in order, notwithstanding the motion to strike out the paragraph was pending?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not make a ruling. The Chair simply made a statement. The Chair prefers not to answer the question of the gentleman from Wisconsin at this time, inasmuch as the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan has been withdrawn and the exact situation to which he refers is not now before the committee.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. DILLON: Page 8, line 5, strike out "$500,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$200,000,000"; and in line 16, after the period, add "$300,000,000 is hereby authorized for expenditures as Congress may hereafter provide to carry into effect the provisions of this act."

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, my amendment seeks to strike out the $500,000,000 and make an absolute appropriation of $200,000,000, and authorize $300,000,000 to carry into effect the provisions of the bill.

Under the terms of this bill, as I understand it, the President may expend this money in four ways: First, he may expend it for expenses of the Federal control. Second, he may expend it, so far as necessary, for the compensation for the use of the carrier's property. Third, he may expend it for the purpose of providing terminals, motive power, cars, and equipment. Fourth, he may purchase any of the railroad securities issued during the Federal control. I take it that he can use this money for no other purpose. If you will examine the language in lines 17 and 18, on page 8, you will find that the President may order and direct the carriers to purchase motive power, cars, and other necessary equipment. Further along in the same paragraph, in lines 2 and 3, on page 9, he may advance the money to the carrier and charge it against the carrier for this same purpose. That being true, I see no necessity of appropriating this vast sum of money. I think the Congress should keep its hands upon the money strings. It is an easy matter for the Executive to come back here if there is necessity for further appropriations. We commit Congress to it by the authorization, and that ought to be sufficient. This body of men has stood almost solidly against this revolving-fund theory. I think we ought to eliminate that theory as far as possible, and require them to come back to Congress whenever the funds may be necessary. In this way we will keep control of our own money. We ought not to appropriate these vast sums of money at this time, because the war may be over in 60 or 90 days. Then, why carry such a large appropriation at this time, when the department can come in here at any time and ask for further money under the terms of the authorization?

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DILLON. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Do you not think that the addition of these 800 short-line bankrupt railroads that we voted in here last Saturday will increase the demand on this revolving fund?

Mr. DILLON. I think it will, in large sums.

Mr. GORDON. Yes.

Mr. DILLON. You will also remember that there are provisions in this bill giving the President the power, prior to July 1, 1918, to turn back any railroad or system of railroads that are not needed. Therefore, you do not need this large sum of money at this time. Why make an appropriation of $5 for every man, woman, and child in this country and put it into the hands of the President at this time? Can you not wait a little while, until the necessity comes, when Congress may make further appropriations as they may be needed?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin desire to speak in opposition to the amendment?

Mr. LENROOT. No; I desire to speak in favor of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does anyone desire recognition in opposition to the amendment? If no one desires to be heard in opposition to the amendment, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from South Dakota, and it presents a very serious and important question to the House, as it seems to me. We ought to give to the President, by way of direct appropriation, all that is needed for the present emergency. Two hundred million dollars will be sufficient for that. But what is provided in the bill? He is permitted not any longer to purchase canals, but boats and barges. He is permitted to make extensions of railroads. He is permitted to purchase securities of railroads without any control whatever by Congress over what he shall purchase.

Now, at any other time and in other circumstances the House would not think of delegating any such power or giving any such large appropriations to the President. Why, what do we require of the Secretary of War in appropriating for the purpose of directly carrying on the war? Do we grant to the Secretary of War so many billion dollars to do with as he sees fit? No; for the purpose of carrying on the war, supplying the men and the guns and the munitions of the war we require him to come to the Military Affairs Committee and make detailed estimates of desired appropriations, and to come to the Appropriations Committee with detailed estimates in case of a deficiency. They have to show Congress what they want the money for and Congress passes upon it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the gentleman realize that that could not be done in the case of the railroads because Congress could not specifically instruct the President how each dollar of the money should be spent? That is the reason for the revolving fund.

Mr. LENROOT. Why not?

Mr. BARKLEY. If the gentleman is putting this on the same basis as in the War Department we would have to cover all of the money into the Treasury.

Mr. LENROOT. Not at all. I want to say that unless there is some provision in the bill, if this is Government money, and the report says that it is, every dollar of the revenue of the railroads under the law to-day belongs in the Treasury of the United States. That ought to be corrected in this bill before it goes out of the House.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the gentleman believe that Congress could attempt to appropriate money for the use of the railroads in the specific detail that is adopted in the preparation of war appropriation bills?

Mr. LENROOT. Absolutely; there is no reason in the world why, if the Director General wants $50,000,000 for the betterment of roads, or extensions, he should not come to the Committee on Appropriations and ask for it, and the committee pass upon it. If he desires to buy $50,000,000 worth of railroad securities, tell me why he should be given a broad blanket power to purchase stocks and bonds of railroads. We ought to authorize this appropriation, and then they ought to come before the Committee on Appropriations and show what they want it for, and the Committee on Appropriations should pass upon it, because it ought to have some relation to the other needs of the Government, and Congress ought to have something to say about it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is not there a strong example in the case of the Shipping Board where we are without ships, and yet the board has successively come to Congress and asked for additional appropriations?

Mr. LENROOT. Absolutely; and there is no reason in the world, outside of the present immediate emergency, why Congress should not have some control. Do we want to grant to any man the power to purchase $500,000,000 worth of securities of railroads without Congress making any further appropriation therefor? Is that necessary to the running of the railroad, is it necessary to have that in a revolving fund for their operation? We require the Secretary of the Navy, we require the Secretary of War, to come before the committee with specific estimates, and why should not we require the same in the Director General running the railroads—that whenever he wants this money for such a purpose as the purchase of boats, utilizing canals, purchasing securities of railroads, that he should come before the Committee on Appropriations. There is no reason in the world why we should in one sweep give him this tremendous power. You may say that we did that in the Panama Canal, but I want to remind you that Congress decided on the construction of the Panama Canal and then we appropriated the money. Here we give power to the President to do or not to do as he sees fit. We have no control either over the thing itself or the money with which to pay for it.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I do hope that before we rise the amendment of the gentleman [Mr. DILLON] will be voted down emphatically. What is the use of taking over the railroads and putting them in the hands of the President and then saying that he can not be trusted to spend a dollar without a specific direct appropriation out of the funds arising from the operation of the railroads. If you can not trust him with $500,000,000 you can not trust him with $200,000,000. It is a clear refusal to trust the President in his undertaking to successfully prosecute the war and operate the railroads temporarily for that purpose. It is not money that is coming out of the taxpayers of the country, unless the railroads fail to produce sufficient revenue or their credit fails. Gentlemen on that side know that there are a number of railroads that have notes maturing in a short time, notes in the banks, notes at a high rate of interest, and if there is no provision to enable these notes to be taken care of by the Director General it will cause a panic, and a number of banks in the country will fail without any fault of theirs. There is not a dollar to be lost; it is merely advancing it for the efficient operation of the railroads and at the same time taking care of the credit of the country and not bringing a panic on a large number of innocent banks and trust companies that took these notes. I am surprised that a gentleman of the intelligence and patriotism of the gentleman from Wisconsin will make such a speech as we have just heard from him.

Mr. ESCH. Is it not estimated that maturities for the current year alone will be $200,000,000?

Mr. SIMS. Yes; over $200,000,000 for the present year.

Mr. LENROOT. Is it estimated that the Government is to pay all of those, or what is this compensation for?

Mr. SIMS. It may become necessary to buy securities of railroads in order to keep them from being offered in competition with liberty bonds. If you are going to vote for this amendment, I do not know what you will not vote for in view of the existing circumstances and threatening possibilities. Suppose it is necessary to build a spur track to some camp or port, must the President come to Congress and get a specific appropriation before he can do so? If this is not intended to make Government operation of these railroads during the war an absolute failure, I would not know how to frame an amendment that would bring about such a result, and I hope that every patriotic man in the House, and I think that every Member is patriotic, will vote against this amendment.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. I would say to the gentleman that this is a very important matter. There are only a few Members here, and I suggest that the committee arise and take a vote when we have a fuller attendance.

Mr. SIMS. Oh, there are over a hundred Members here now. To defeat this amendment does not need a full attendance.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Michigan is right, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Eighty-four Members present, not a quorum.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 9685 and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. HOWARD, for two days, on account of illness in the family; and

To Mr. DALLINGER, for one week, on account of illness.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I am not disposed to delay the passage of this bill at all, but there are a number of important committee meetings going on with which an 11 o'clock session interferes. The Ways and Means Committee is now considering a bill of vast importance, which it is necessary to consider as quickly as possible. We have a meeting to-morrow, and we could not possibly get through, as we hope to do, with that bill if the House meets at 11 o'clock. Therefore I object.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 52 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, February 26, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 26, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, the sources of Thy power are hidden from our view. We can not measure the infinite depth of Thy power, but Thou hast revealed unto us Thy love. Thou hast given Thyself to us to love. We know its length and height and depth and breadth. Thou hast spoken the last word of love to the universe. Thou hast performed the highest act of love for men. Thou dost call us to Thyself through the revelations of Thy love in Thy Son. Incline our hearts, O God, to seek Thee, to love Thee, and to serve Thee, and our duties then will be well performed. We ask Thy blessing. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Vice President being absent, the President pro tempore (Mr. SAULSBURY) assumed the chair.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The absence of a quorum is suggested, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hollis	Page	Smith, S. C.
Calder	Johnson, S. Dak.	Penrose	Smoot
Colt	Jones, Wash.	Phelan	Sterling
Culberson	Kellogg	Pittman	Stone

Gerry	Martin	Sheppard	Trammell
Gronna	Nelson	Sherman	Underwood
Hale	New	Shields	Wadsworth
Harding	Norris	Simmons	Williams
Hardwick	Nugent	Smith, Ga.
Henderson	Overman	Smith, Mich.

Mr. GRONNA. I desire to announce that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent, due to illness in his family.

Mr. ASHURST. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] is detained from the Senate by reason of illness.

Mr. McNARY. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] is absent on account of illness.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce the absence of the junior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] on official business. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. FERNALD. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE].

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. GOFF] on account of illness.

Mr. RANSDELL. I desire to announce that the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] is necessarily detained from the Senate.

Mr. PHELAN. I wish to announce that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] are detained from the Senate on official business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-eight Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

ESTIMATES OF APPROPRIATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of State submitting supplemental estimates of appropriation in the sum of $147,856.72 required by the State Department in connection with the Diplomatic and Consular Service (S. Doc. No. 189), which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Postmaster General submitting an estimate of appropriation in the sum of $140,000 required by the Post Office Department in the enforcement of certain provisions of the espionage and trading-with-the-enemy acts (S. Doc. No. 186), which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of War submitting an urgent estimate of deficiency in the appropriation for purchase of land, military post, Schofield Barracks, Hawaii, $9,700, etc. (S. Doc. No. 188), which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of the Navy submitting supplemental estimates of appropriation in the sum of $2,628,200 required by the Navy Department for the fiscal year 1918 (S. Doc. No. 187), which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF DIRECTOR GENERAL OF RAILROADS.

Mr. HOLLIS. I desire to ask permission to have printed in the RECORD without reading the order of the Director General of Railroads as to the status of employees. It is short.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

RAILROAD DIRECTOR IN GENERAL ORDER CORRECTS CERTAIN WRONG IMPRESSIONS CONCERNING THE STATUS OF EMPLOYEES.

The Director General of Railroads has issued the following order:

Order No. 8.

WASHINGTON, February 21, 1918.

To correct wrong impressions that may exist regarding the employment and conditions of labor in railway service, it is, until further order, directed that—

1. All acts of Congress to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon the railroads, including acts requiring investigation of accidents on railroads and orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission made in accordance therewith, must be fully complied with. These acts and orders refer to hours of service, safety appliances, and inspection.

PERSONS HELD TO ACCOUNT.

Now that the railroads are in the possession and control of the Government, it would be futile to impose fines for violations of said laws and orders upon the Government, therefore it will become the duty of the Director General in the enforcement of said laws and orders to impose punishments for willful and inexcusable violations thereof upon the person or persons responsible therefor, such punishment to be determined by the facts in each case.

2. When the exigencies of the service require it, or when a sufficient number of employees in any department are not available to render the public prompt transportation service, employees will be required to work a reasonable amount of overtime. So far as efficient and economic operations will permit excessive hours of employment will not be required of employees.

WAGES AND HOURS.

3. The broad question of wages and hours will be passed upon and reported to the Director General as promptly as possible by the present Railroad Wage Commission. Pending a disposition of these matters by the Director General, all requests of employees involving revisions of schedules or general changes in conditions affecting wages and hours, will be held in abeyance by both the managers and employees. Wages, when determined upon, will be made retroactive to January 1, 1918, and adjusted accordingly. Matters of controversy arising under interpretations of existing wage agreements and other matters not relating to wages and hours will take their usual course, and in the event of inability to reach a settlement will be referred to the Director General.

TERMS OF EMPLOYMENT.

4. In Order No. 1, issued December 29, 1917, the following appeared: "All officers, agents, and employees of such transportation systems may continue in the performance of their present regular duties, reporting to the same officers as heretofore and on the same terms of employment."

The impression seems to exist on some railroads that the said order was intended to prevent any change in the terms of employment during governmental operation. The purpose of the order was to confirm all terms of employment existing upon that date, but subject to subsequent modifications deemed advisable for the requirements of the service. Any contrary impression or construction is erroneous. Officers and employees will be governed by the construction here given.

5. No discrimination will be made in the employment, retention, or conditions of employment of employees because of membership or nonmembership in labor organizations.

ALL IN GOVERNMENT SERVICE.

The Government now being in control of the railroads, the officers and employees of the various companies no longer serve a private interest. All now serve the Government and the public interest only. I want the officers and employees to get the spirit of this new era. Supreme devotion to country, an invincible determination to perform the imperative duties of the hour while the life of the Nation is imperiled by war, must obliterate old enmities and make friends and comrades of us all. There must be cooperation, not antagonism; confidence, not suspicion; mutual helpfulness, not grudging performance; just consideration, not arbitrary disregard of each other's rights and feelings; a fine discipline based on mutual respect and sympathy; and an earnest desire to serve the great public faithfully and efficiently. This is the new spirit and purpose that must pervade every part and branch of the national railroad service.

NATION'S LIFE AT STAKE.

America's safety, America's ideals, America's rights, are at stake. Democracy and liberty throughout the world depend upon America's valor, America's strength, America's fighting power. We can win and save the world from despotism and bondage only if we pull together. We can not pull apart without ditching the train. Let us go forward with unshakable purpose to do our part superlatively. Then we shall save America, restore peace to a distracted world, and gain for ourselves the coveted distinction and just reward of patriotic service nobly done.

W. G. MCADOO,
Director General of Railroads.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I have a telegram which is signed by about 150 or 200 prominent citizens of Denver, Colo. I do not ask that the names be printed, but I simply wish to read the portion of the telegram in the nature of a petition. It is addressed to me, and it says:

We, the undersigned citizens of Denver, urge you to do everything possible to secure the votes necessary for the passage of the Federal suffrage amendment in the Senate during this session of Congress.

As I stated, it is signed by Dr. Margaret Long, daughter of former Secretary of the Navy, John D. Long, and by 150 to 200 of the most prominent citizens of the city of Denver. These petitioners have witnessed the operation of woman suffrage in Colorado for years and their indorsement should convince all of its beneficial effects. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Woman Suffrage.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GRONNA presented a memorial of the Farmers' Club, of Kindred, N. Dak., remonstrating against the adoption of the so-called Walsh bill giving over to the rich corporations and private individuals certain mineral resources and water-power sites, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a petition of Meridian Grange, No. 265, Patrons of Husbandry, of Kent, Wash., praying for the enactment of legislation fixing the prices of all commodities during the war, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of the Commercial Club of Boise, Idaho, praying for the enactment of legislation making it unlawful for any common carrier to charge or receive any greater compensation for the transportation of passengers, or of like kind of property, for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same route in the same direction, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. JONES of Washington presented a petition of the Patriotic League of Newport, Wash., praying that the earnings of all aliens in excess of the pay of a private soldier in the Army shall be confiscated to the use of the Government, etc., which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the City Council of Bellingham, Wash., requesting that in the enactment of any water-power legislation to specifically authorize the several States and legal subdivisions thereof to condemn the rights of the licensees upon Government lands, upon making just compensation therefor, under the provisions of the eminent domain statutes of the various States, etc., which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented resolutions adopted by Sweet Clover Grange, No. 635, Patrons of Husbandry, of Valleyford, Wash., favoring the conscription of the wealth of the country, and also that the income tax be so amended that all incomes from whatever source in excess of $5,000 a year be taxed 100 per cent, etc., thereby helping the farmers in the replacement of man power on the farm, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. McLEAN presented a petition of the Young Woman's Hebrew Association, of Hartford, Conn., and a petition of sundry citizens of Middletown, Conn., praying for the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the United Irish Societies, of Torrington, Conn., praying for the freedom of Ireland, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a memorial of the Central Labor Union of Meriden, Conn., remonstrating against the adoption of the so-called Borland minimum eight-hour provision, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WARREN presented resolutions adopted by the Wyoming Chapter of the American Mining Congress, in convention at Casper, Wyo., favoring the establishment of a Department of Mines, which were referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Wyoming Chapter, American Mining Congress, in convention at Casper Wyo., favoring Federal control over the industries of the country, which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of Local Union No. 2314, United Mine Workers of America, of Dietz, Wyo., remonstrating against universal military training, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. ROBINSON presented sundry papers to accompany the bill (S. 3888) for increasing the efficiency of Army bands, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REIMBURSEMENT OF BENSON COUNTY, N. DAK.

Mr. GRONNA. From the Committee on Indian Affairs I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 3915) to reimburse Benson County, N. Dak., for money expended in the care of three insane Indians, and I submit a report (No. 288) thereon. I call the attention of my colleague [Mr. McCUMBER] to the bill. It is a unanimous report from the Committee on Indian Affairs. The bill was introduced by my colleague.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let it be read.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $676, to reimburse Benson County, N. Dak., for money actually paid by said county to the State of North Dakota for care of three insane Indians, Mary Josephine Pejihutaskana, Alfred Littlewind, and Joseph Langer, in the North Dakota State Insane Asylum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask to have the report printed in the RECORD. It is very brief.

There being no objection, the report this day submitted by Mr. GRONNA was ordered printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[S. Rept. No. 288, 65th Cong., 2d sess.]

Mr. GRONNA, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3915) to reimburse Benson County, N. Dak., for money expended in the care of three insane Indians, having considered the same, report thereon favorably to the Senate, without amendment, and recommend its passage.

The Indians referred to in the bill are citizens of Benson County, N. Dak. They all have property, but under the Indian laws the county can not take that property or any part of it for the care and maintenance of the insane Indians. The laws of North Dakota provide that when a person is adjudged insane and sent to the asylum, if he has property, that property shall be used for his care and maintenance in the asylum. The officials of Benson County are compelled to pay this amount of money out of the general fund. Prior to January 1, 1916, they had also paid out a considerable sum of money and had endeavored to have the Government remove these Indians to a Government or Indian asylum. In the appropriation bill for 1916, money was appropriated to pay for the maintenance of these Indians up to that time, and the officials of Benson County understood that the Indians were to be removed to some other asylum. This was not done until August 30 last. In view of the action taken by Congress before and the neglect of the Indian Department to take care of these Indians, Benson County should be reimbursed for the money actually expended, as shown by receipts and vouchers filed by the county auditor of Benson County, N. Dak. The vouchers and other papers showing the payments by the county are hereto attached, as follows:

COUNTY OF BENSON,
Minnewaukan, N. Dak., February 6, 1918.

Hon. P. J. McCUMBER,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Inclose herewith receipts from the State treasurer showing payments made for the insane Indians from date of last settlement until they were transferred to Government asylum.

I hold the same view as before, that the Government holding their property in trust, thereby being exempt from taxation, the county should be reimbursed for the payment indicated.

Hoping this can be adjusted as before, I am, with kind regards,

Yours, very truly,

W. E. PAULSON,
Auditor Benson County, N. Dak.

ADDITIONAL JUDGE, NORTHERN DISTRICT OF CALIFORNIA.

Mr. SHIELDS. From the Committee on the Judiciary I report back favorably with amendments the bill (S. 2910) providing for an additional judge for the northern district of California, and I submit a report (No. 289) thereon. I call the attention of the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] to the bill.

Mr. PHELAN. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill just reported by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from California if there is any real necessity for the immediate consideration of the bill?

Mr. PHELAN. The reason I desire to have the bill acted upon at this time is that there is a very great urgency for its passage. The Federal bench in California have requested the creation of this new judgeship, which does not involve any extra expense, except the salary of the judge, because no provision need be made for more clerk hire. It seems that since June last there have been 611 criminal cases filed in that jurisdiction, and that the civil and admiralty business has practically stopped on account of the congestion of the calendar. The United States district attorney asks action. The Senate has in the last few days approved, under similar circumstances, the creation of judgeships in one of the Montana districts and in one of the Arizona districts, and I desire to have this bill passed and go to the House to be considered in connection with those bills. That is my only reason for asking for immediate consideration of the bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I shall have to ask for the regular order until we get through with morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. NELSON:

A bill (S. 3953) authorizing conveyance by deed to William Orr of a one-eighth acre of land on Pelican Lake (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 3954) to appoint Albert Fensch to the rank of captain and adjutant general, United States Army; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 3955) to amend section 4041, Revised Statutes, enabling the Postmaster General to forbid payments of postal money orders in connection with the exclusion of fraudulent devices and lottery paraphernalia from the mails;

A bill (S. 3956) to amend section 213, act of March 4, 1909 (Criminal Code), affixing penalties for use of mails in connection with fraudulent devices and lottery paraphernalia;

A bill (S. 3957) to amend section 215, act of March 4, 1909 (Criminal Code), penalizing fraudulent use of the mails; and

A bill (S. 3958) to amend section 3929, Revised Statutes, relating to exclusion of fraudulent devices and lottery paraphernalia from the mails; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

By Mr. McCUMBER:

A bill (S. 3959) to grant patent to certain lands to Christian Fredrickson; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. PHELAN:

A bill (S. 3960) for the relief of George Killeen; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 3961) to extend the franking privilege to the American Red Cross in all its official work; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

By Mr. TILLMAN:

A bill (S. 3962) to amend section 13 of article 8 of section 1624 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relative to the receipt on board a vessel of the Navy of goods, merchandise, or treasure for freight or safe-keeping (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. POMERENE:

A bill (S. 3963) to amend and supplement section 1009 of the act entitled "An act to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes," approved October 3, 1917; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. HOLLIS:

A bill (S. 3964) for the relief of Otis C. Mooney (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. MARTIN:

A bill (S. 3966) to reinstate Surg. J. A. Guthrie, United States Navy, retired, as medical director in the United States Navy, as an additional number; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

A bill (S. 3967) authorizing the President to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint John B. H. Waring, late a captain in the Medical Corps of the United States Army, a major in the Medical Corps on the retired list, and increasing the retired list by one for the purposes of this act; and

A bill (S. 3968) to provide that certain members of the National Guard drafted into the military service of the United States shall not lose their right to count their prior service in the National Guard in computing the additional pay authorized for length of service; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. HALE:

A bill (S. 3969) granting a pension to Emma A. Gannett (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. McKELLAR:

A bill (S. 3970) for the relief of Charles Lee Baker; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

THOMAS HARRISON.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to take a minute or two to make a statement with reference to a bill I am about to introduce. It is not a bill of general interest, but simply applies to one individual. The human element in it, however, appeals to me quite strongly.

Thomas Harrison is a clerk in the Naval Observatory. He is now in his ninety-first year. He entered the observatory as a clerk in 1848, and has been there continuously in service ever since—almost 70 years. Under date of November 2 the Assistant Secretary of the Navy wrote him this letter:

I have to inform you that in accordance with the recommendation of the Superintendent of the Naval Observatory you have been granted leave without pay for six months beginning October 13, 1917.

As you have been in the employ of the Government now nearly 69 years, and during all that time your record has been excellent, I regret that there is no way in which the department could continue you on the rolls with compensation. I desire at this time to express the appreciation of the department of your long and satisfactory service and the hope that you will be so benefited by this leave that you can return and resume your duties at its expiration.

That leave of absence will soon expire, and this man, in his ninety-first year, will go back to work. I do not think that ought to have to be, and so I have prepared a bill, which I expect to introduce, to retire Mr. Harrison at $50 a month. I will say that the Senate has heretofore passed a bill to retire him at $100 a month. It is at his own suggestion that the amount is reduced to $50 a month. I think he has done what you will find very few people in the employ of the Government have ever done. A few years ago, realizing his infirmity and realizing his inability to do the work of the Government as efficiently as he had before done it, he asked the department to reduce his salary, and it was reduced about $400 a year.

Mr. President, I know that this might be objected to as a civil-service pension, but there are mighty few cases of this kind in connection with the Government service. I do not suppose that there is any other person in the employ of the Government who has been in continuous employment so long as this man. We can take care of this man without making a precedent that will vex us. We have taken care of individuals of military service by special legislation. Why not this man under these exceptional circumstances? Furthermore we are going to pass ere long a general retirement law. He may be gone before it is passed. We should treat him as his service justifies. Therefore I desire to introduce this bill, and I hope that the Naval Affairs Committee will give it early consideration and that they will feel justified, in this particular case, in recommending the action provided in the bill.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I merely wish to express the hope that the Naval Affairs Committee, if they report this bill favorably—and it does appeal to the heart of every Senator—will so amend it as to pension every man in the United States 91 years of age who has been toiling in season and out, and pay him the salary of the beneficiary in this measure.

The bill (S. 3965) retiring Thomas Harrison, a clerk in the Naval Observatory, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

AMENDMENT TO THE POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. NORRIS submitted an amendment providing that hereafter carriers on rural free-delivery mail routes shall be paid in addition to the compensation now provided by law an allowance for maintenance of equipment on routes of 24 miles or less of $250 per annum, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Post Office appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed.

WAR FINANCE CORPORATION.

Mr. CALDER submitted five amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3714) to provide further for the national security and defense, and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to provide credits for industries and enterprises in the United States necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. HALE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3714) to provide further for the national security and defense, and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to provide credits for industries and enterprises in the United States necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

REPORT OF PANAMA RAILROAD CO.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, on February 21, 1918, there was submitted to the Senate a message from the President of the United States transmitting the sixty-eighth annual report of the board of directors of the Panama Railroad Co. to the stockholders for the year ending June 30, 1917. It was referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals and ordered to be printed. In the report there are a number of illustrations, and I ask that the Public Printer be authorized to print the same.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Utah what is the object of printing this document? Is anyone going to read it?

Mr. SMOOT. Under the law the report is required to be made once a year, and it has always been printed in the past.

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the law provides for it what is the use of an order of the Senate?

Mr. SMOOT. The law provides that the report shall be made to Congress. I do not think the law provides that it shall be printed. As I said before, it always has been printed in the past, and this year it happens to have some illustrations, and therefore I have to ask the authority of the Senate that the illustrations shall be printed.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I heard the Senator's statement the other day about the crisis in securing a sufficient supply of paper to print the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and I wanted to know if the Senator was entirely satisfied that the public interests demand the printing of this voluminous document with the illustrations?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think so, but I will say that on the 21st day of February the Senate ordered the report to be printed, and as the Senate has ordered it to be printed and it is accompanied with illustrations it is necessary to get an order for the printing of the illustrations.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. It seems to me there ought to be no objection to printing this report. It is the report of the Panama Railroad Co., a Government railroad. We have been in the habit of printing these reports, and the public has been getting them. There is not any reason on earth that I know why it should not be printed. I have had occasion to look into the reports a great many times, and I think there should be no question about the printing of this report.

Mr. GRONNA. Of course, I shall not object to the printing of the report, but I think this report, like the books shown by my good friend on my right, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], will be one of the documents that will never be read by anyone. I have been here during the winter, and when my constituents sent petitions to me, which they had a right to do, and which, under the Constitution, we have the right to have printed, I have felt a sort of embarrassment and have refrained from asking that they be printed, a great many of which I believe ought to have been printed. I am not finding any fault with the request of the Senator from Utah; I think perhaps all these things ought to be printed for the benefit of the public; but there is no more reason why petitions which come from the people of the remotest parts of the country should not be printed in the RECORD. I say it is an injustice to the public to deny to them the printing of these petitions.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to ask the Senator from North Dakota if it is not true that this report is among the records of the Panama Railroad Co and is filed in their office, and anyone who is interested in the transactions and business of the company can readily obtain it by visiting the office and examining the report there?

Mr. GRONNA. Answering the question of the Senator from Washington, of course these reports can be had; they are accessible to anyone who wants to make an investigation of them, and the only end that the printing of this report will secure is that it will afford the opportunity of sending it to the public; but of course the report now is a matter of record, just as much so as it will be after it has been printed as a separate document.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It would be difficult for a Member of Congress to find anyone among the public who wants a copy of the report; in fact, I think that generally there would be very few of them read. There are very few people in the United States who would want to examine it. There is just as much reason for printing the report of the Northern Pacific Railroad, and a great deal more reason. I should like to know what these illustrations are. I do not understand why there is any necessity to have photographs and pictures reproduced in a railroad report.

Mr. GRONNA. Of course the Senator from Utah can answer that better than I. I know this, however, that it is very expensive to have cuts made and illustrations printed.

I only rose, Mr. President, to call attention to the fact that I think the censorship has extended to the United States Senate, and when petitions are sent here from citizens of the United States asking to be heard I do not believe the petitioners should be denied that constitutional privilege.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to printing the illustrations in the report?

Mr. THOMAS. I object.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish simply to say to the Senator from Colorado, if the illustrations are not to be printed I want at this time to have the Senate reconsider the vote which was taken February 21 ordering the printing. The Senate has already ordered the report to be printed, not knowing that there were any illustrations in the report, it having just been handed down by the President of the Senate. Afterwards it was discovered that there were two illustrations. Under the law the Public Printer can not print illustrations in any document ordered by either House unless there is a special order made by the House that ordered the printing. All that I ask is that we allow the Public Printer to print these two illustrations in the report if we are going to have it printed. If we are not going to give that authorization, then the situation is this: The Senate ordered on the 21st of February this document printed.

Mr. OVERMAN. What is the document?

Mr. SMOOT. It is the annual report of the Panama Railroad Co. that is sent by the President of the United States to Congress every year under the law. I do not care whether it is printed or not.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator——

Mr. THOMAS. If the illustrations can be excluded, I shall not object; but I do object to transforming the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD into a pictorial magazine.

Mr. SMOOT. This is not to be printed in the RECORD, I will say to the Senator from Colorado. If it were, of course it would have to have the sanction of the Joint Committee on Printing.

Mr. THOMAS. My objection applies also to Senate documents. My experience with Senate documents is—and I think it is also the experience of all other Senators—that once any subject assumes the form of a Senate document, it is buried in the archives, and it is buried forever.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have no quarrel with the Senator from Colorado on that point, but the two illustrations show the Panama Canal itself and also show the railroad along the canal.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the Senator will remember that about two years ago, over our mutual objection, the Senate ordered the printing of an enormous document for the purpose of establishing the self-evident fact that there was a monopoly in water power in the United States. I venture to say that not 10 per cent of the Senators have ever since so much as looked at that document, and it is piled up en masse somewhere as an accumulation. I was told a day or two ago that the Government had rented a short time since a warehouse somewhere near the Capitol, which was filled to overflowing with documents that are of no use to anybody on earth and never will be.

Now, we are printing documents with pictures in them. That simply increases the expense, which is already more than even the Senate ought to bear. I do not want to act the part of a dog in the manger here, Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection has been made to the printing.

Mr. THOMAS. I withdraw the objection in view of the statement which has been made by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] that the Senate has heretofore ordered this matter printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] objected. Does the Chair understand him to withdraw his objection?

Mr. GORE. I did not object, Mr. President.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I withdraw my objection.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I have examined the illustrations which are contained in this document; and since the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] is so anxious to have them printed, I do not think it will do any harm.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order will be entered.

GUARANTEED PRICE OF WHEAT.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] suggested a moment ago that it might be well occasionally for the Senate to hear from the remoter parts of the country. I have some letters here from the remoter parts of the country—from practical farmers—in relation to the food situation generally, and in relation to the meat and wheat situation in particular. Both of these situations I regard as most serious. I therefore ask to have these letters read into the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? There being no objection, it is so ordered. Is the Chair to understand that the Senator desires that the letters shall be read by the Secretary, or shall they be printed in the RECORD?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I suggest to the Senator to have them printed in the RECORD.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, my request was that the Secretary shall read the letters. I may say that the writer of the first letter has an entirely erroneous conception of the joint resolution which I introduced to raise the guaranteed price of wheat from $2 to $2.50 per bushel. The joint resolution related exclusively to the crop of 1918, and would not affect in any way the crop of wheat grown in 1917, and would not have the effect he anticipates.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Consent to that has been given, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read the letters, as follows:

PIEDMONT, OKLA., February 18, 1918.

Hon. THOMAS P. GORE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR AND FRIEND: I have thought for some time to write to you, but you know farmers usually just keep still and take their medicine. But as things has gotten almost unbearable I have thought I would write. Now, Mr. GORE, I see that the Government is about to put another price on wheat of from $2.50 to $2.75. Well, that would have been better in the first place than what they did. Now, if you do that, that won't help the poor fellow that has already sold his wheat, for $1.90 is what I got for mine; and those farmers that were well fixed, so that they could hold their wheat well on, will get the benefit of the new price, for there are some farmers in my neighborhood that are holding their wheat.

Now, Mr. GORE, I have farmed all my lifetime, and I ought to know something about farming. Twenty-five years ago I farmed in a corn county in Iowa. Well, we raised mostly corn and hogs and cattle. If corn, perchance, would bring 40 or 50 or 35 cents we would kill our pigs or let them die and sell our corn, because we wouldn't have to risk the chance for cholera; and, of course, the hogs weren't as high in price then as now. If we got $4 or $5 for them it was a big price. Now, then, why did Mr. Hoover want to put a price on wheat and not on corn and all other crops? It does look to me like class persecution. Now, we Oklahoma farmers are principally wheat farmers. All in the world we got last year was a little wheat. I had 300 acres of wheat. It made 8 bushels per acre; lots of it only made from 3 to 6 bushels. Now, we know if there was no price put on it we could have gotten $3 or $4 a bushel, and could buy our feed for our horses. I have to keep from 15 to 25 head of horses to farm 500 acres of land and didn't raise a bit of feed. I had out 250 acres of corn and oats, but the drought got it. So you see the Government wanted us to put out another big crop, which I did. I put out 400 acres of wheat, which took 400 bushels for seed. Well then, I had 2,000 bushels left, for which I got $1.90 a bushel. I could have sold this wheat at one time for $2,000 more than I got for it.

Now, you see I have a large family. My living and all the expenses had to come out of it, and the consequence is I have to borrow money for this high-priced feed. In fact, Mr. GORE, nearly all the farmers here in Oklahoma are in that fix. Now, if the Government wants to increase the supply of wheat, it will have to put a fair price on feed. Now, there are hundreds of farmers and ranchers that simply can't buy the feed. Stock will eat their heads off, so they have let thousands of cattle die. Why, I am feeding wheat. I have got to. It is a half cheaper than other grains; and it isn't myself alone; there are plenty more are feeding wheat.

I used to hear so many say that flour was too high to eat. Well, I would say to them, "Let's figure." I have a family of nine; we use a sack of flour a week—21 meals. It cost me 16⅔ cents a meal for flour and 18 cents for sugar and 100 cents for meat. So you see the flour is the cheapest thing we have on the table. Mr. GORE, I do hope that that bloody war will soon come to an end or we may have a famine right here—and our poor boys over there being killed.

I believe this will be all for this time. Maybe it will be more than you wanted to hear from me. I hope you can read my writing. I am working hard and a poor speller, too. My love to you.

MEDFORD, OKLA., February 20, 1918.

Senator GORE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I see from the daily papers you have several bills introduced to govern the price of the 1918 crop of wheat, and as I am a farmer I will give you what information I can as to conditions in this locality, and I think the same conditions exist practically all over the wheat belt of Oklahoma.

After harvest last year I set in to put out 400 acres of wheat, but when the Government set the price of wheat at $1.90 in Medford I sowed 20 per cent less than I planned to sow, and had I that warning in time I would have cut it 20 per cent more than I did, and I know of a number of farmers that are just like myself in that respect. Now it is not because we are not patriotic and want to help our country, but we could not exchange 100 pounds of wheat for 100 pounds of corn, so you can readily see we had better farm other crops that will not take so much hired help and crops that we can feed to a better advantage than we can wheat.

Unless the price of wheat is advanced or other stuff cut down in proportion to the price of wheat there will not be more than half the acreage sown next season.

Now, Senator, do not think I am complaining, but simply giving facts as I see them, and the Government can not expect us to continue to raise wheat when we can raise other crops more profitably.

CUSTER, OKLA., February 16, 1918.

Senator T. P. GORE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Unless Congress acts favorably on your bill in the next 60 days, to increase the price of the 1918 wheat crop, this country will find itself in a desperate fix for wheat.

Excepting a narrow strip along the eastern parts of Nebraska, Kansas, Oklahoma, and Texas, the prospects for wheat is the poorest in the history of the western country. Eighty per cent of the wheat was sown late; much of it is not up yet; this late wheat will be very thin. With favorable weather this wheat could make from 5 to 10 bushels per acre. There are several millions of acres of wheat in this condition in the western country, but $2 wheat in central markets means $1.60 per bushel on farms of the West. As wheat is so far out of line with all other commodities the farmers are preparing to plow the thin wheat up and plant to corn and kaffir. They can figure on raising from three to five times as many bushels per acre of corn or kaffir as they can figure from the thin wheat, and corn and kaffir is worth very near as much per bushel as wheat.

The farmers of the spring-wheat belt will sow less wheat and more oats and barley as they can expect to raise from three to four times as many bushels of oats or barley per acre as they can of wheat. The oats and barley will bring them twice as much money per acre as the wheat will. A 7-foot wheat binder now costs $260, according to the Kansas City Star. Prior to February 15, 1917, the price was $185; after that date $200; will likely cost $300 before harvest. The trouble is that Congress will likely fiddle along until too late to save the situation, like Hoover ordering sale of hens stopped after farmers had sold all they intended to sell.

MAY, OKLA., February 18, 1918.

DEAR SENATOR GORE: We note your efforts to price wheat at least at the cost of production. All your friends appreciate this. You would do the Nation and the world a wonderful service if you could get Mr. Herbert Hoover to allow us, as he agreed to do, a price for fat hogs and cattle that would pay us to feed. Many of us here, relying on his promises, have bought cattle, hogs, and corn in our effort to help in this time of need.

Now, as this stock is near ready for market, Mr. Hoover is allowing the packers to take this stock from us without paying us the cost of production. At the present price of corn we lose just 40 cents on every bushel we feed.

Now, we can howl patriotism; and, yes, we will produce to feed the nations, but any sensible person knows that we can't produce at the present prices, as they are below the cost of production.

If we don't get relief immediately, we are going to kill our pigs, ship our sows, take our loss, and quit the business. Hundreds of our neighbors are going to do the same, not because they want to, but because these ruinous prices force them to. Relying on Mr. Hoover's promises last fall that he would see that the feeder got pay for feeding, and trying to answer his request to help furnish meat, we began feeding about a thousand cattle and hogs. On the basis of the present market our patriotic business venture will cost us a loss of $5,000. We are also in the store business.

When hogs were 20 cents in Kansas City, we paid Swift & Co. 45 cents a pound for choice bacon. Now hogs are 16 cents in Kansas City and Swift's choice bacon is 47½ cents.

Newspapers boast wonderfully that Swift & Co. paid 34 per cent dividend last year and many other things that don't look good to we common people. We are not intending this as a faultfinder or chronic complainer, but we want to call attention to facts as they exist.

As prices are now thousands of acres of land will not be tilled, as a farmer can make more money shipbuilding or most any other job than he can farming.

Bread and meat are more essential in peace or war than guns and bullets. These things are worth attention. If we are forced to sell our meat at less than cost of production next season, we will have for our Armies 1 hog where otherwise we would have had 10.

Our farmers and stockmen will produce even for cost of production, but can't produce at a loss. Assuring you of our appreciation of your efforts in the past,

We are, respectfully,

——— ———.

PASADENA, CAL., February 14, 1918.

DEAR SIR: California wheat crops this year will, I believe, be almost a total failure. No rain and high prices of labor—we paid $5 to $8 per day last year for harvest hands and could hardly hire them for that price, when we generally pay $2 and board. Last year, 1917, we had in 35,000 acres on my ranches in grain, mostly wheat. This year we won't have in 1,500 acres. We can't seem to sell our last year's crops. Too much red tape. The warehouses here seem full of hides of cattle starving to death. Still shoes are high. Something's wrong. We should get $3 per bushel for wheat.

Respectfully,

KINGMAN, KANS., February 21, 1918.

Senator GORE.

DEAR SENATOR: I see by the papers that you have a bill in committee, and that it is favorably reported, to place the price of the 1918 wheat crop at $2.50 per bushel. I am a wheat raiser and have been for many years, and was among the number that was in the big loss all over Kansas in the 1917 crop; and as one of the raisers let me say—but there is little use for a wheat raiser to say anything—that I think that the amount you name in your bill is poor compensation for the present crop and the losses we met last year. If we had been looked after by the Senators and Representatives from the West, we would not have had to raise a crop at a loss, as we did last year. The millers and other raisers, factories, and, in fact, everybody, was in it but the wheat raisers. The crop, Senator, is going to be very poor, and it never looked worse in 10 years than it does right now. Now, listen, if it is light, the Kansas and Oklahoma farmers will not harvest it at a loss, as they were compelled to last year. Here is an example of how things are running. Before the setting of prices on wheat bread per 22-ounce loaf was selling at 10 cents, or about 9 cents if a dollar's worth of tickets were taken and paid for in advance. Since the setting of the wheat and the regulation of the loaf a 16-ounce loaf costs 10 cents. Now, flour is some lower and also bread is higher. If you, OWEN, CURTIS, and THOMPSON, had looked after the wheat raisers at the time of price fixing, we would not have lost a few millions in both States, and it went into the hands of the millers and bakeries. Two dollars and eighty cents is just as easy to get through the law powers as $2.50 is and would help to make up the loss we met last year. I have been among the farmers a good deal lately, and I know how they feel over it. The millers got the grade and testing rules through, and that is another way of robbing the wheat raisers. They are gradually buying the elevators, and it will not be very long until they have the farmer in their clutches. It is coming, and all because the farmer is not organized, but will be. But these kinds of laws, Senator, puts hate in his heart, and it ought not to be allowed. You will see, and there is now in sight, the farmers' union that will turn things upside down. And it might have been avoided if things were looked after instead of let run as now. Lincoln said once, very truly, that "a thing was never settled until it was settled right." The grading and testing rules should be made differently and the minimum price made not less than $2.80.

Yours,

——— ———.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I wish simply to state, in view of the statement by one of my constituents in a letter which has just been read, that while the price-fixing commission were considering the question I frequently urged them to fix a price that would be fair and just to the wheat growers of Kansas and the country and urged that the then market price would be fair and just. Furthermore, on the day before the price was fixed at $2.20 three other Senators and myself from wheat-growing States called upon the price-fixing officer and urged him to name the market price of wheat at the time the bill passed as the price for the 1917 crop. Had this price been fixed, as the farmers were entitled to have it fixed at the time, the farmers of Kansas would have received for their 1917 crop of wheat from $2.50 to $3 a bushel. In conclusion I desire to state that I did everything in my power to have a fair, just, and reasonable price fixed for the 1917 crop of wheat.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the author of this letter is also misinformed as to my own position touching the food-control legislation. Perhaps Senators will remember that I was not very enthusiastic for that measure.

LAWS OF PORTO RICO (S. DOC. 185).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on the Pacific Islands and Porto Rico:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

As required by section 23 of the act of Congress approved March 2, 1917, entitled "An act to provide a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes," I transmit herewith copies of the acts and resolutions enacted by the Ninth Legislature of Porto Rico during its first session (August 13 to November 26, 1917, inclusive).

These acts and resolutions have not previously been transmitted to Congress.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 25, 1918.

WHY AMERICA IS IN THE WAR.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, there is an insidious and treasonable propaganda being conducted in this country, grossly misrepresenting the causes which impelled this country to wage war against Germany, agitated with the deliberate design of producing dissatisfaction among our people, of restraining their patriotic fervor and willingness for sacrifice, in order to secure a German-made peace, amounting to a substantial German victory. This pernicious propaganda is vast and varied in its ramifications, extending from the bold, treasonable utterances of some persons of prominence and position to the subtile whisperings of the paid spy. Its loathsome form is found at times garbed in the habiliments of patriotism and peace. Under the plea of liberty of speech the viper has been found injecting its deadly poison into the body politic. Wherever there exists discontent, which might retard a vigorous prosecution of the war, it is found with its treasonable torches furnishing additional fuel for the flames. With insinuating voice it preaches class and sectional prejudice in order to produce dissension and military ineffectiveness and prevent a solid union, which insures to our arms a conclusive victory. Engaged in this work is a motley crew composed of fanatics, German spies and sympathizers, persons corrupted with German gold and promises, officered by a few selfish politicians, who foolishly think they see an opportunity for self-advancement, although it may result in wreck of country. Athens had her Æschines in the pay and interest of Philip, eloquently preaching peace and submission. This German propaganda is not confined to the United States, but has arisen in every country where German gold, spies, and influence could permeate. It corrupted and obtained control of the former autocratic Government of Russia, which if it had not been overthrown would have made an ignominious and cowardly peace. It has strangled the new hopeful Republic of Russia, and is now fast obtaining by treachery what it could never obtain by arms—the making of Russia the political slave of Germany.

During two of the most critical years of the war it enabled the traitorous Greek King to thwart the noble aspirations of his people. It almost brought disaster to Italy. It extends to the Latin-American Republics, making some of them lukewarm to their own vital interests or unfriendly in the world's conflict of democracy against military autocracy. It has soothed others into fancied security, dulled their perception, prevented them from perceiving that in the far-flung battle lines of Europe is being determined whether the Western Hemisphere shall be subject to colonization and spoliation by a triumphant Germany.

While exciting her own people to the highest pitch of martial spirit, brutalizing them by prosecuting war with unequalled ferocity and barbarity, preparing to seize all that relentless might can obtain, Germany, in order to make more easy her conquests, has cunningly sought to develop among all other peoples the Arcadian habits of peace and ease and thus eradicate the heroic virtues of courage and sacrifice. These blood-thirsty people and their sympathizers, in order to accomplish their nefarious purposes in other countries, ever masquerade as staunch advocates of peace. All these pernicious varieties of German propaganda are being sown in this country with the hope of reaping a bountiful harvest.

But the seed will prove to have fallen in a sterile soil. Cunning deceit, cowardly ease, and ignoble peace will find no lodgment in America's sturdy mind and courageous heart. We propose to deal vigorously with this traitorous propaganda in whatever guise it may appear. We are determined that our brave soldiers while fearlessly attacking the enemy front shall not be assaulted by traitors in the rear. The defenders of our citadel of civilization and liberty shall not be betrayed by false friends within.

Mr. President, the purpose of my address is to present the causes which compelled America to enter this world war, and these when fairly stated furnish complete refutation of the false and slanderous charges being disseminated by the agents of Germany. I shall present them strictly from an American standpoint. I shall enumerate the many and repeated affronts, insults, and grievances we received at the hands of Germany and which compelled us as a self-respecting Nation to seek redress. I shall point out our vast vital interest assailed by Germany, which if not defended at all hazards would result in our national decay and destruction. I shall show that this war is being waged to right American wrongs, to protect great American interests, which, if lost, will destroy our present prosperity and greatness and jeopardize our very existence as a free and independent people. I shall not discuss the war in its broader phases and the far-reaching consequences it must eventually have upon all the peoples of the world through the coming centuries. I shall not portray the importance of the fierce and final conflict now being fought for supremacy between the free governments of the world and the German military autocracy, for out of the dense battle smoke now enshrouding Europe will emerge a world either free or enslaved. I shall not describe to you in all its revolting detail how the military autocracy of Prussia, by false and deceitful diplomacy, by broken pledges and treaties, by unjust, unprovoked, and cruel wars against neighbors, grew and strengthened; how it made vassals of the people of southern Germany, Austria, Bulgaria, and Turkey and then utilized all the immense resources thus secured in preparing for this fateful hour of conflict, when it hoped by favorable military decision to obtain world mastery. I shall not emphasize the great menace that Prussia is to-day to the peace and civilization of the world by recitals from her bloody history.

Mirabeau, the great orator of the French Revolution, justly said, "War is the chief industry of Prussia." I shall not detain you reading diplomatic correspondence, which proves beyond dispute that Germany, finding herself fully prepared for war and her unsuspecting neighbors unprepared, suddenly precipitated war by using the murder of Archduke Ferdinand of Austria, which occurred on Austrian soil and was perpetrated by an Austrian subject, as a pretext to compel her vassal, Austria, to address a brutal, insulting ultimatum to Serbia, knowing full well that it would be rejected, since its acceptance would seal Serbia's national servitude. I shall not present to you other diplomatic correspondence which clearly proves that when the Governments of Britain, France, and Italy had nearly composed the differences between Russia, Serbia, and Austria and peace was almost in sight, all of these bright prospects were destroyed by Germany suddenly declaring war against Russia, immediately followed by a declaration against France and the invasion of Belgium. I shall not weary you by detailing the history of the long-extended and varied efforts of Germany to incite enmity and hostility against the United States, Britain, France, and Russia and of her long-meditated purpose to encompass the overthrow of these four nations, as being the only barrier to her ambition for world supremacy. I shall not seek to excite your passions by describing the horrible barbarities and atrocities perpetrated by Germany in the prosecution of this war; how weapons of warfare forbidden by civilization have been frightfully used; how women and children have been shot and butchered; how the captured civil population, as in former barbarous times, has been seized, transported, and practically reduced to slavery; how cities and districts have been pillaged, ravaged, and destroyed with a cruelty and completeness excelling the fiendishness of Atilla the Hun, named "The scourge of God"; how the atrocious Turk was induced to declare a fanatical holy war, instigated to massacre the Christian population of Armenia and Asia Minor and furnish sacrificial blood for the altar of Germany's selfish ambition. I shall not endeavor to describe to you the woe, distress, wretchedness, the frightful slavery which would exist in the world dominated by a power so cruel as Germany, guided by no principle save its own advantage, controlled by no solemn treaty or plighted faith, and willing to make a desert of the world in order that she might rule it. All of these are far-reaching and important considerations which were sufficient to have induced us to unite with other free and threatened governments of the world to curb Germany's unholy desires. But it is not my purpose to venture into this broad and important field of discussion, but to confine myself to presenting the special wrongs, the special grievances, and special vital interests of this Nation which compelled the President and Congress last April to declare war against the enemy of mankind.

Mr. President, immediately after the commencement of this great war the President of the United States, by a formal proclamation, declared the policy of this country would be to maintain a position of strict neutrality toward the belligerents and to claim all the rights of a neutral under international law, and firmly to vindicate these rights, from whatever source assailed. The President went so far as to invoke our people to be neutral alike in thought, expression, and action. This declared policy was fairly and consistently adhered to until we were compelled by the outrageous action of Germany to abandon it and resort to force to redress wrongs and defend our rights. Our entire conduct toward Germany prior to entering this war was one of forbearance under great provocation rather than one of harshness and discrimination. Germany can not point to an unneutral act indulged in by our Government to justify her atrocious conduct, which compelled us to enter the war. The Government of the United States did not deviate in the slightest degree from this marked pathway of strict neutrality.

When loans were first sought to be obtained in this country by the various belligerents, the Government discouraged the extension of credit to any of them, as it might be construed as unneutral, and, besides, at that time financial conditions rendered it inadvisable. When this policy of discouraging loans was afterwards abandoned, each of the warring nations were permitted to float loans in this country, and each of them did obtain large credits from our people. One of the first of the warring nations to sell Government bonds here was Germany. She was given access to our financial markets equally with the other belligerents. Our citizens were permitted to subscribe for her bonds without the slightest governmental discrimination. The loans so floated in this country bear ample testimony to this fact. Subsequent disclosures revealed that the loans thus obtained from our people were corruptly and disgracefully used in the perpetration of innumerable villainies and enmities against the peace and well-being of this Nation. Germany, with her customary duplicity and depravity, perverted American generosity and kindness into an instrument of injury and detriment.

We furnished Germany a still more substantial proof of our neutrality. When the allied nations at war with Germany sought to have submarines partially constructed in this country, shipped to Canada, and then completed and sent to Europe to be used, this Government let it be definitely understood that this would not be permitted, as the United States had insisted in her contention with England in the Alabama and other cases during the Civil War that ships of war could not be constructed, in whole or in part, in a neutral territory for the use of belligerents without violating the laws of neutrality and subjecting the country in which they were built to claim for all damages they might inflict. The position assumed by our Government against this project of the allies caused it to be abandoned. We subsequently gave additional proof of our firm determination to maintain neutrality in this direction. In November, 1916, the Department of State was informed that an inventor in Los Angeles desired to send to one of the belligerents, as a model, a one-man submarine. While it was stated that this submarine was sent as a model it appeared that it was, in fact, a completed vessel. The Secretary of the Treasury requested an expression of opinion from the State Department as to whether this vessel could be shipped, and he was informed that the shipment of such a submarine from an American port should not be allowed, as such action might be regarded as a violation of the neutrality laws. Permission for the shipment of this vessel was refused. Even as late as this, after having received repeated affronts from Germany, we still adhered to impartial neutrality.

In July, 1916, we gave the German Government further proof of our strict neutrality. The German submarine Deutschland arrived at Baltimore loaded with a cargo from German ports. The British and French Governments protested and insisted that submarines should not be treated as merchant vessels, and hence should not be given clearance papers to leave and should even be deprived of the 24 hours given war vessels under international law to enter and depart from the port of a neutral country. Our Government promptly examined the Deutschland, and finding on her no guns or torpedoes promptly denied the contention of the allied Governments and held that the Deutschland was a merchant vessel and should be permitted, as the merchant vessels of the other belligerents, to enter and depart from American ports carrying such cargo as she desired. When it was rumored that the Deutschland would be attacked by the allies, and possibly within the 3-mile shore limit of the United States, our Government sent its war vessels to the Virginia Capes to enforce our neutrality and to see that the Deutschland was not molested within 3 miles of our shores, which under international law is a part of our territory.

Again, on the night of October 31, 1916, she arrived at New London, Conn., from Bremen, Germany, with a cargo, which she was permitted to land and dispose of, reload with another cargo, and depart for Germany. On each of these occasions the Deutschland was permitted to include in her cargo munitions and other contraband and depart unhampered and unrestrained. She was accorded to the fullest extent the same privilege of obtaining here arms, munitions, and other contraband as was given the merchant vessels of the other belligerents. This proves conclusively that we made no discrimination against Germany and that she was given the same rights and privileges to obtain munitions and contraband of war as was accorded the allies. Under universally accepted international law the citizens of a country can sell any belligerent munitions and contraband of war. In every war since 1870 Germany has freely exercised this international right and has sold large quantities of munitions and contraband. In our war with Spain her citizens furnished large quantities of munitions to Spain without complaint from us. If she did not obtain here as many munitions of war as the allies, it was her misfortune and not our fault. It was on account of her weakness on the seas and the inability of her vessels to reach our shores and not on account of any discrimination or refusal on our part to sell to her. Such of her vessels as did reach our ports were accorded the same privileges and received the same treatment as was given the vessels of the allies. The assertion made by some that Germany was discriminated against in this respect is false and unwarranted.

The generosity of our action is further emphasized when we remember that this magnanimity on our part occurred after we had received repeated insults and injuries from Germany.

Mr. President, evidence of our genuine neutrality does not cease here, and we can furnish from our diplomatic correspondence many cases in which it appears that we almost departed from neutrality in a manner favorable to Germany. In October, 1914, the German gunboat Gier arrived in the harbor of Honolulu and requested permission to make repairs to render the vessel seaworthy, and estimated that the time required would be two weeks. Under international law a vessel is permitted to enter a neutral port and remain there 24 hours to obtain supplies and a reasonable time to make needed repairs. The United States gave this gunboat three weeks in which to make repairs and depart. This was a most liberal exercise of right of neutrality favorable to Germany. This vessel afterwards, finding it unsafe to depart on account of the presence of enemy warships, decided to interne. In January, 1915, the British warship Faun, which had been captured by Germany, entered the port of San Juan, P. R., in charge of a German prize crew. The British Government insisted that this vessel as a prize be released from its German captors under the regulations of The Hague convention. After examining the circumstances of the case, the United States Government refused the request and decided it was a proper German prize.

In the early part of the war various German warships entered the ports of the United States and were generously accorded every courtesy and were given ample time to make repairs and obtain supplies. Not a right was ever denied any of them. If there was any departure from neutrality, it was in favor of Germany. The conduct of the United States in this respect was so liberal and so generous that letters of thanks and commendation were received from German officers and diplomatic representatives.

We furnished further evidence of our resolute purpose to maintain neutrality even under circumstances which might have brought us in dangerous conflict with the allies. On February 18, 1916, the British cruiser Laurentic stopped the American steamship China on the high seas and, despite the protest of the captain, removed from the vessel 28 Germans, 8 Austrians, and 2 Turks and took them to Hongkong, where they were detained as prisoners in the military barracks. Upon being informed of this incident, the Government, on February 23, 1916, protested to the British Government against the action of the Laurentic as an unwarranted interference with the sovereignty of American vessels on the high seas and insisted that orders be given by the British authorities for the release of the persons taken from the China. The British Government replied, alleging that the persons removed from this vessel had been engaged in intriguing and fostering a rebellion in India and in fitting out a ship to prey on British commerce, and insisted that these acts of enmity and misconduct had deprived them of all protection of the neutral flag under which they were sailing and the action of the Laurentic was therefore justified. The United States Government replied to the British Government that the alleged facts regarding the conduct and action of the persons seized did not make them subject to seizure on a vessel of the United States on the high seas and within the jurisdiction of a neutral, and renewed the demand for their release. On May 5, 1916, this Government was informed that the British Government acquiesced in our demand, and the men were released.

Can more conclusive evidence be furnished than this to prove that this Government firmly asserted her rights as a neutral, even against the allies and regardless of consequences. This firm assertion of our neutral rights for the protection of German, Austrian, and Turkish citizens occurred after Germany had wantonly murdered American citizens by sinking the Lusitania and other merchant vessels, which citizens were exercising similar international rights and privileges on the high seas.

These instances constitute but a small portion of our record for firm neutrality during the several years in which this country was not engaged in this great war. History does not furnish another such striking record where a strong and powerful nation under great provocation so scrupulously observed and maintained its neutrality. Our record is one of unsurpassed patience, forbearance, and long suffering.

Mr. President, let us now consider the treatment we received at the hands of Germany in return for our consistent and continuous course of neutrality. Sir, I do not believe there can be found grosser or more numerous insults and injuries inflicted upon a proud and powerful nation than those which Germany repeatedly imposed upon us. Immediately upon the declaration of war by the German Emperor against Russia and France in August, 1914, after we had declared our adherence to strict neutrality and were firmly maintaining it to the utmost, the German Government commenced at once to disregard every right we possessed as a neutral, affronted our honor, assailed our territorial sovereignty, and endeavored to destroy our most vital interests. German military and naval officers accredited to this Government as diplomatic representatives at once indulged in improper activities in violation of the local laws of the United States and their duties as representatives of a foreign government in a neutral country. These German officials illegally sought by many and varied activities to make this country a base for German military operations against nations with whom we were at peace and contrary to the principles of international law. The money obtained here from our citizens by the sale of German bonds was corruptly used to further a traitorous propaganda in this country to make the United States a subservient and useful tool for the accomplishment of the despicable aims of the German autocracy. It was used to finance and incite a rebellion in India against the British people, with whom we were at peace and amity. It was used to promote from this country the German inspired and German supported uprising of Sir Roger Casement. It was used to hire incendiaries to burn and wreck bridges and destroy the important industries of Canada, our northern neighbor. It was used to purchase and prepare bombs to be placed upon allied and neutral ships lying in our harbors, in order to destroy them and injure commerce. It was used to encourage strikes and sabotage in our manufacturing plants. It was used to corrupt persons to preach here hatred and enmity against the nations at war with Germany. It was used to produce division and dissension among ourselves so as to render us powerless to resist German affronts and injuries. German diplomatic officials duly accredited to this Government were detected using fraudulent and counterfeit passports purporting to come from this Government and attesting American citizenship to enable their spies to enter foreign countries at peace with us. German officers of interned warships, who were being treated with the utmost consideration, disgracefully violated their word of honor and escaped. German subjects, under direction of German officials, were detected, arrested, tried, and convicted in our courts for using our territory as a base for supplying German warships with coal and other supplies in violation of the statutes of the United States and our neutrality. German officials, in violation of our laws, were found endeavoring to control the employees in our munition plants and other industries so as to cripple and destroy them. The German ambassador accredited to this country obtained from his Government a sum of money to be used to try to influence the Congress of the United States in the interests of the German Empire.

The German diplomatic representatives while still exercising their functions as such in this country were found endeavoring to incite a rebellion in Haiti and Santo Domingo and to create enmity against us in Central and South America. German agents were detected endeavoring to arouse an insurrection in the Southern States of the colored race against the white race by gross mispresentation and appeal to racial prejudice. Wretches were hired and paid to destroy railroad bridges in this country, to wreck large munition plants and factories, and to cripple radio stations and cable lines. The lives of peaceful laboring men and women were in constant danger from these activities, which were but a covert form of war carried on by Germany within our boundaries.

For several years we had known of German activities in Mexico prejudicial to our interests and of efforts to embroil us in war with that distracted country. The extent and dangerous character of these activities, though suspected, were not fully known until the publication of the Zimmermann letter, which disclosed the efforts being made in Mexico by the German Government to incite that nation to war against us. This letter reached the lowest depths of national turpitude. The German ambassador, while enjoying our hospitality, was informed of a contemplated breaking of a solemn assurance which he himself had given to our Government promising to respect our international rights upon the sea, and was told that if we did not tamely submit to this broken pledge and gross invasion of our rights, then he should endeavor to combine Mexico and Japan with Germany in warfare against the United States, pledging the German Government to conquer us and to give Texas, Arizona, and New Mexico to Mexico, and the Philippine Islands, Hawaii, and our Pacific coast to Japan. The absurdity of the scheme did not lessen its shameless enormity. This infamous note could not have been suddenly precipitated without previous careful consideration and possibly prior intrigue. Large national interests and combinations are not thus hastily determined. This note disclosed conclusively what we long suspected, that for many years in all parts of the world Germany has been intriguing, seeking to create enmity against us, and endeavoring to prepare combinations to overpower us when the time for war came and which she had practically determined to wage against us.

Since the recent establishment of more friendly and cordial relations between our Government and the Government of Japan, the officials of Japan have candidly confessed that Germany has been intriguing in Japan, seeking to involve her in war with us. The strained relations existing between the United States and Japan for years was the result of German intrigues, machinations, and misrepresentations. The German Government has publicly expressed its refusal to acquiesce in the Monroe doctrine, and has called it "a piece of American impertinence." We have been satisfied that when political conditions should be favorable and the German navy strong enough, the Monroe doctrine would be challenged, as would also our control and ownership of the Panama Canal. We recall that during the administration of President Roosevelt the German Government, under the pretense of collecting a debt had prepared to seize the ports and part of the territory of Venezuela, and persisted in her determination to do so over the protest of the President until he bluntly informed the German ambassador that if the German fleet seized a port of Venezuela that Admiral Dewey with the American fleet would be instructed to capture or destroy the German fleet. As our fleet at that time was superior to the German fleet, the German Emperor reconsidered and abandoned the enterprise. Venezuela would now be a German colony but for the resolute firmness of the President and our superior naval strength.

We know that during the Spanish-American War Germany endeavored to array all the nations of Europe against us and form a concert of European powers to defeat our military forces and prevent us from liberating Cuba. We know that this dangerous combination against us would possibly have been successfully organized except for the refusal of England, whose fleet dominated the seas, and who was manifestly friendly to us.

In the light of recent transactions and disclosures we now fully understand the action and presence of the German fleet at Manila and its persistence in interfering with the plans of Dewey, and we are now convinced of what we then suspected, that its purpose was, if opportunity offered, to seize the Philippine Islands and deprive us of the fruits of our victory. These intrigues should convince everyone that Germany had reached a determination to destroy us as one of the four powers sufficiently strong to interfere with her plans for world-wide supremacy. This purpose was further disclosed by the repeated menaces of the German Emperor to our ambassador, Mr. Gerard, when the Kaiser told Mr. Gerard, "America had better look out after war," and again when he said, "I shall stand no nonsense from America after the war."

Mr. President, it would seem to me that these injuries and wrongs were sufficient to call for the strong resentment of any brave and high-spirited people, and we would have been justified in immediately declaring war against Germany. But we were called to endure still greater affronts and the invasion of still more important rights. On the 7th of May, 1915, the British steamship Lusitania was torpedoed and sunk by a German submarine without warning and over 100 American citizens, most of them women and children, lost their lives. This act was committed in direct contravention of previous warnings by our Government that it would not permit such violations of international law. It was as cruel and shameless an act of murder as ever perpetrated. It exceeded piracy in its worst and most revolting form. No buccaneer that roved the sea ever performed a more fiendish act. Worse than the infamy of the act was its approval and defense by the Imperial German Government. The heinousness of this crime was so revolting that it aroused an outraged people and the civilized world, and at last wrung from a reluctant Government a solemn promise that the offense would not be repeated. The assurance was hardly given before it was grossly violated and other ships having on board American citizens torpedoed and sunk by German submarines under conditions equally cruel and murderous. This unprovoked murder of American citizens so inflamed public opinion in this country that the German Government became apprehensive and repeatedly in diplomatic notes assured us that these occurrences were unintentional, would be corrected and never again committed, and that for them full reparation would be made. Our Government was also assured that in the future merchant ships of whatever nation, before being torpedoed, would be searched and the safety of the passengers assured, and in no case would an American ship flying the American flag be interfered with.

Trusting to this solemn pledge and promise, we thought that at last all differences between the United States and Germany which might precipitate war had been settled and the necessity of our entering this terrible war avoided. But we were woefully mistaken, and we soon found ourselves betrayed, as have been all others who relied upon treaties made and assurances given by the Imperial German Government. Immediately following this positive promise many ships were sunk without warning and without the safety of passengers being provided for. A more faithless performance of promises made by one Government to another can not be found than that exhibited by the German Government in dealing with the United States. All these assurances have been regarded as mere scraps of paper, to be instantly disregarded when German interests and desires demanded their violation. No pledge made to us by the German Government has been kept, no promise fulfilled, and no reparation agreed to made. We have continuously been subjected to evasion, delay, duplicity, and deceit.

The German chancellor, in an address made to the Reichstag on January 31 of last year, immediately following the reversal of the submarine policy of the preceding year and the consequent gross violations of repeated pledges and promises made to our Government, in explaining the change stated that there never had been any intention of abandoning the unrestricted use of the submarine; that he had adopted a policy of postponement in order to construct more submarines; and that now, having obtained a sufficient number to be effective, the time had come to resume this method of warfare to the fullest extent. A more shameless confession was never made by a responsible minister. We were coldly and brutally informed that Germany never intended to keep her repeated pledges made us to desist from illegal submarine warfare; that these pledges were made with the deliberate design of deceiving us, of lulling us into fancied security, and preventing our war preparations, while Germany should be given full opportunity to prepare for the intended conflict. A public admission that German national faith was fraudulently pledged to secure benefits of delay by deception and that this plighted national faith would now be ruthlessly broken, as great advantage could be obtained.

Mr. President, all of these wrongs and violations of our rights, gross and flagrant as they were, paled into insignificance in comparison with the injury and insult sought to be inflicted by the decree issued by the German Imperial Government on January 31 of last year. The German Imperial Government by that decree notified us, in contravention of pledges and promises made us in more than a dozen notes, that it would, after February 1 of that year, mark out a war or barred zone in the Atlantic Ocean more than 1,400 miles long and 1,200 miles broad, all of the Mediterranean Sea, except a small portion fringing the coast of Spain, and that all vessels entering the zone, flying the flag of any nation, bent upon any purpose whatsoever, would be sunk without warning. Under this decree entering this barred zone was a criminal act and doomed the merchant ship to instant destruction. The German Government assumed ownership and control of this large part of the Atlantic Ocean and practically the entire Mediterranean Sea. Through this vast area in the Atlantic and Mediterranean passes more than three-fourths of the world's vast foreign commerce. Imagination is powerless to picture the great inconvenience to navigation, the immense dislocation and destruction of trade and commerce which would have occurred if we should have submitted to Germany's arrogant assumption of control and ownership of these vast sea areas. Three-fourths of the world's trade and commerce would have ceased at the arrogant dictation of Germany. The entire world would have been reduced to distress and bankruptcy in order to enable Germany to accomplish her designs. Under this decree an American vessel, sailing from any of our ports containing only foodstuffs (and not an article of contraband) for the ports of Holland, Denmark, or other neutral countries, with no intention of entering the ports of any belligerent, and daring to cross any part of this barred zone, became under this decree a proscribed outlaw, divested of all rights of international law, all considerations of humanity, and was doomed to instant destruction. This was the most arrogant and far-reaching and destructive attack upon the freedom of the seas ever attempted by any nation. It was an act of tyranny and impudence unsurpassed in the world's history.

If Germany had a right to appropriate for her sole use and control this vast sea area, which under international law has ever been held a common highway for the use of all nations, she had a right to appropriate all the seas of the world and control them as her selfish will might dictate. The issue could not be shirked. This German decree precipitated a conflict for the freedom of the seas. We were forced to decide whether we would wage war to maintain the freedom of the seas as a common heritage to all nations or whether we would cowardly submit to the tyrannical decree of the German Government appropriating unto its own use these vast sea areas. The very civilization of the world dependent upon trade and commerce was thus put in peril. No nation is more vitally concerned in the freedom of the seas than the United States.

Our foreign commerce far exceeds that of any other nation and its continuance and its growth are indispensable to our prosperity and progress as a people. Hamper by restrictions or destroy our vast foreign commerce and bankruptcy and ruin will overshadow alike mine, farm, and factory. The future greatness of this Nation is inseparably interwoven with the freedom of the seas. They are one and inseparable. When we wage war for this we are contending for the most vital of all American rights. If we were to surrender to Germany the freedom of the seas and permit this infringement upon this common heritage our posterity would never forgive us for the ignominy of that cowardly submission. Could a nation submit which in its infancy fought the War of 1812 for infringement of its rights, which are trifling beside this German arrogance? Have we, a Nation of 100,000,000 people, with a domain truly imperial, sunk to a point where our conduct can be prescribed from Berlin? Shall America, which suppressed the piracy of the Barbary Corsairs in behalf of free seas, take orders from the German pirates, who command submarines? With strong arms and brave hearts we must accept the challenge and valiantly defend our most cherished rights. While thus battling for our own most vital interests, we are also contending for the rights of humanity and civilization. Did those who counseled peace and submission to Germany fully realize the great distress to which they invited us? For the fiscal year 1916 our total exports amounted to $5,481,000,000. Out of this $3,382,000,000 was exported to the allied belligerent countries, with which Germany prohibits us from having any commercial intercourse whatsoever. If we had acquiesced in this illegal and tyrannical proclamation and degree about three-fifths of our entire export business would have immediately ceased. It would have meant that at once we would be precipitated from great prosperity to acute financial and industrial distress. The great profits of mine and factory would have immediately disappeared. Present busy and thriving centers of industry would be overcrowded with the unemployed. Of our agricultural exports, two-thirds of our wheat, five-sixths of our hog products, six-elevenths of our cotton, seven-eighths of our beef, and three-fifths of our tobacco last year were exported to these allied belligerent countries. To have acquiesced in Germany's prohibition of the exportation of these agricultural products to these countries would have meant bankruptcy and ruin to all these great and varied agricultural interests. Submission would have brought greater loss, greater distress than has war itself.

If we had acquiesced in this decree there would have immediately been a cessation of practically all of our foreign commerce. Our ports would have been filled to overflowing with the products of our labor and industries. Factories and mines would have been closed. Labor, now receiving high and remunerative wages, would have been unemployed and in the deepest depths of want and distress. The present rich and prosperous grain growers of the West would have had their barns filled with wheat, corn, and oats for which there was no profitable market, and instead of the great wealth now possessed by them they would have been overclouded with bankruptcy and ruin. The vast cotton crop of the South could not have been sold for the cost of production, and that large section would have been completely prostrated by debt and insolvency. The great tobacco crop, which this year brought the highest price ever received, would not have sold for sufficient to pay the fertilizer bills, and those engaged in this great industry would have been financially ruined. Our present prosperous cattle raisers and meat producers would have encountered the same dire disaster which would have overtaken all other enterprises. The products of farm, mine, and factory having no profitable sale could not have been shipped, and the traffic on our railroads would have been greatly reduced, resulting in acute financial distress to the holders of railroad securities and to all those employed in railroad transportation. Capitalist, investor, manufacturer, laborer, farmer, miner, would all have been submerged in universal ruin and bankruptcy. This order creating a barred zone properly should be entitled "A decree of the German Emperor for the industrial and financial prostration of America." Honor, humanity, and our own vital and national interests demanded that we should resist this tyrannical order and uphold to the fullest extent the freedom of the seas as a highway of commerce for us and all nations.

Mr. President, the deliverance of this impudent and infamous order to our Government by the German Government itself constituted sufficient cause for a declaration of war against it on our part. But still anxious to preserve the peace and, if possible, avoid war, the President of the United States, instead of urging at that time a declaration of war, severed diplomatic relations with Germany, gave the German ambassador his passport, and recalled our ambassador from Berlin. Unless we had promptly declared war, there was no other course left for a self-respecting nation to follow.

Still patient and forbearing, we hoped this would be sufficient warning to Germany to induce her to make proper redress for our grievances, give assurances there would be no future infraction of our rights, and at once withdraw this lawless order. To further emphasize our firm determination to maintain our rights upon the high seas and at the same time, if possible, avoid war, the President of the United States delivered an address to Congress requesting that he be empowered to arm our merchant ships with naval guns and man them with naval crews. If granted, this would have been a clear indication to Germany of our intention to insist upon our rights to the extent of war unless she desisted from invading them.

This was the last and only manly course left for us to pursue in order to avoid war. If Congress had promptly given this power to the President, it might have convinced Germany that this Nation was possessed of a firm determination to maintain her rights, and if they were further violated it would mean war. Germany would have been compelled at once to decide whether she would abandon her course or enter armed conflict with us. This wise measure, firm and resolute in its purpose, yet offering the only way for peace, promptly passed the House of Representatives, and would have as promptly passed the Senate by an overwhelming majority except for the filibustering tactics of four or five Senators who, under the rules of the Senate, were able to prevent its passage before the 4th of March, when, under the Constitution, that Congress expired. The defeat of this measure in the American Congress convinced Germany that we did not have the will and courage to defend our rights and that we would tamely submit to any indignity and outrage she might perpetuate upon us. Germany reasoned that if the American Congress, commissioned by the people to be the defenders of their rights, was too cowardly to arm their own merchant ships to resist the lawless attacks of submarines that no injustice, no injury, she could inflict would compel us to warfare. Convinced by the defeat of the measure for armed neutrality that the United States was too craven to fight, hardly had Congress adjourned before Germany commenced the enforcement of this lawless and impudent decree.

On March 16, immediately following the adjournment of Congress, the American steamer Vigilancia, flying the American flag, having a cargo consisting of dried fruit, straw, and other merchandise, and having no contraband on board, sailing from New York for Havre, was torpedoed and sunk by a German submarine without warning, and 15 American citizens were lost. This vessel was flying the flag of the United States and was so marked that there could be no doubt as to her nationality. While the surprise and indignation occasioned by this attack upon an American ship and the American flag was still stirring the American heart, cablegrams contained the further information that on the following day, March 17, 44 miles off the Irish coast, the American steamer City of Memphis, flying the American flag, and sailing from Cardiff, in Wales, to her home port, New York, in ballast, not intending to stop in any belligerent country, was torpedoed and sunk by a German submarine. A few hours later on the same day cablegrams brought the information to an indignant America that the tank steamer Illinois, flying the American flag, and sailing from London to Port Arthur, Tex., was shelled by a German submarine and sunk.

The indignation occasioned by these outrages and insults to American rights had not subsided when we were informed on March 21 that 25 miles north of the Netherlands' coast the American ship Healdton, sailing from Philadelphia for Rotterdam, a neutral port of Holland, flying the American flag, was without warning twice torpedoed by a German submarine and sunk, and 21 of her crew, many of them American citizens, were lost. None of these American ships offered any resistance to the submarine or attempted to escape. None of them was armed. In destroying these vessels in no case did the submarine make any provisions for the safety of the crew or any efforts to aid them. None of these vessels was conveying munitions of war or contraband to the enemies of Germany. They were engaged in peaceful and lawful commerce. The only offense committed by these four American vessels was that in the prosecution of their legitimate business they sailed upon open seas, the free and common heritage of all nations, but which the German Imperial Government, by its decree of January 31 last, had forbidden them to use, and for this, and this alone, they encountered ruthless destruction at the hands of German submarines. All of these vessels were of American registry, flying the American flag, and entitled to all the protection that the Stars and Stripes could give.

And besides, before these vessels ventured upon these seas the Government of the United States had given them positive assurance, publicly and in diplomatic correspondence with Germany, they would be fully protected in all their rights. Our citizens owning vessels and navigating them had a right to rely upon these official promises and assurances. We were called upon to determine whether we would keep faith with them or cowardly fail them when the real test came. We were called upon to determine whether we should use the vast power possessed by this great Government to protect them as we had officially and solemnly pledged, or cravenly leave their wrongs unredressed and unavenged. We were called upon to determine if we should permit our flag, the emblem of our honor, our power, and our aspirations, to be lawlessly and deliberately assaulted upon the high seas and refuse to strike with all the force possessed by us, the arrogant assailant. If we can not defend Old Glory, the most cherished object of our pride and affection, we have indeed sunk to low depths of shame and humiliation, and we are no longer "worthy sons of worthy sires." The heritage of courage, fortitude, and honor bequeathed us will be foully forfeited. The American flag will no longer be, as it was made by our brave forefathers, the shield and protection of American citizens in every part of the world. The stars of our statehood and union will no longer gleam from unsullied skies. Their radiance will be dimmed by clouds of doubt, timidity, and fear. The stripes of our flag, emblematic of the thirteen original Colonies, who flung these streams of light to illumine the world, will be forever darkened.

Mr. President, an incident in the life of St. Paul has impressed me more than everything else I have ever read as an illustration of the power of the Roman Empire. St. Paul was seized and about to be scourged to death by an officer. Quietly and calmly he remarked, "Is it lawful for you to scourge a man that is a Roman citizen and uncondemned?" The knowledge that he was a Roman citizen caused the scourge to drop from the then nerveless hand of the affrighted officer. Jewish malice and hatred, which sought his death, was instantly restrained, and this great apostle was saved by the potency of the protection that Rome gave her citizens. They dared not lay their lawless hands upon St. Paul, for if they had, immediately the Roman legions bearing the Roman eagles would have come to swiftly avenge his wrongs and teach them the majesty and power of Rome.

Sirs, if St. Paul in the hour of peril and persecution could claim the protection of the Roman eagle, will we deny our sailors and citizens in the prosecution of their lawful enterprises on the high seas the protection of their flag? Is the American flag less potent than the Roman eagle? It can not be, unless our hearts are less manly, less courageous than those that pulsated in the Roman breast. I desire to see the day come when an American citizen, in whatever clime or country, whether on land or sea, can, like the Roman citizen of old, obtain full protection in all his rights by the simple utterance, "I am an American citizen." Then, indeed, will our flag attain a richer and deeper majesty, a brighter and greater glory.

Mr. President, the destruction without provocation of these American vessels, flying the United States flag, was a flagrant act of war against us by Germany. It was warfare in its most relentless and despicable form. What more could Germany do to wage war against us than with her submarines to lawlessly attack our ships, destroy our commerce, and wantonly assault our flag? She had already officially invited Japan and Mexico to join her in warfare against us. She had subjected us to every conceivable insult, had murdered more than 300 of our citizens, had inflicted on us every possible injury except the invasion of our territory. The great fleet of Britain rendered Germany powerless to reach our shores and subject us to her frightful devastation and cruel barbarities. These atrocious attacks of Germany upon our flag and our sovereignty no longer left it in our power to decide whether we should have peace or war. The die was already cast. Germany was already persistently waging determined, cruel warfare against us. The question for our decision was one of cowardly submission or courageous resistance. We had vainly endeavored to remain neutral and be friendly, but through long-suffering and humiliation we had been taught that Germany desired no friends—she would have only slaves or enemies. Forced by her to decide between servitude and warfare, the President and Congress did not hesitate for a moment, but promptly and bravely accepted the warfare flagrantly thrust upon us by Germany, declared the existing state of war, and dedicated to its successful prosecution the lives and fortunes of this mighty Republic. This action was in consonance with the heroic will of the American people. They scorned base, cowardly submission. They were willing to make all necessary sacrifices to vindicate their national honor, to protect their vital national interest, to redress their many wrongs and grievances. They were willing to unite with other free peoples to crush a brutal military despotism, which was threatening to destroy the liberty and free institutions of the world. They were willing to bear their full share of war burdens to save civilization from the most vicious attack ever made upon its existence. Forced into this war by Germany, America proposes to continue its prosecution until Germany has been taught to observe scrupulously all treaty obligations, to adhere to all the rules and principles of international law, and to cease to be a menace to American and other free democracies.

Mr. President, when the sun set on the 31st day of July, 1914, it set to rise never again upon the same world. It set with a world at peace; it rose to witness the beginning of a terrific war, which has practically engulfed the world and which, for weal or woe, will forever change its destiny. This fierce and widely extended conflict will greatly change the map of the world. Past traditions, existing national boundaries, reigning dynasties, present governmental structures, all subjected to the severe shock of this conflict, will be greatly altered, many shattered, and some forever obliterated.

When the great storm of battle shall break away and disappear there will emerge an entirely new world—either a brighter one, blessed with increased liberty, justice, and hopes of permanent peace, or a darker one, dominated by military autocracy and despotism, ruled by brutal force, and ominous of further fierce wars. We have ungrudgingly aligned ourselves in this conflict with the nations contending for the better, grander, nobler world. An American poet has well expressed the conditions which confronted Congress in April of last year:

Once to every man and nation comes the moment to decide,
In the strife of truth with falsehood, for the good or evil side;
Some great cause, God's new Messiah offering each the bloom or blight,
Parts the goats upon the left hand, and the sheep upon the right;
And the choice goes by forever 'twixt that darkness and that light.

Mr. President, we rejoice beyond measure that when this fateful moment came America firmly and courageously decided to venture all she possessed in the cause of honor, truth, justice, liberty, and righteousness.

HOUSING OF SHIPYARD EMPLOYEES.

Mr. RANSDELL. I move that the Senate take up for consideration the conference report on Senate bill 3389, the ship housing bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Louisiana moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 3389) to authorize and empower the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation to purchase, lease, requisition, or otherwise acquire improved or unimproved land, houses, buildings, and for other purposes.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. RANSDELL. I hope the Senator will not insist upon the presence of a quorum, because we are very anxious to get this matter completed.

Mr. KENYON. I have understood that some Senators who are not here desire to be present. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hardwick	McNary	Sheppard
Bankhead	Henderson	Martin	Simmons
Beckham	Hollis	Nelson	Smith, Ga.
Borah	Johnson, S. Dak.	New	Smith, Md.
Calder	Jones, N. Mex.	Norris	Sterling
Colt	Jones, Wash.	Nugent	Sutherland
Culberson	Kellogg	Overman	Swanson
Curtis	Kenyon	Penrose	Thomas
Frelinghuysen	Knox	Phelan	Tillman
Gallinger	Lewis	Pittman	Townsend
Gerry	Lodge	Poindexter	Trammell
Gore	McCumber	Ransdell	Underwood
Gronna	McKellar	Saulsbury	Vardaman
Harding	McLean	Shafroth	Wadsworth

Mr. LEWIS. I announce the absence of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], and the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], occasioned by personal illness.

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague, the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], on public business.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. FLETCHER] on public business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-six Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the so-called ship-housing bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 3389) to authorize and empower the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation to purchase, lease, requisition, or otherwise acquire improved or unimproved land, houses, buildings, and for other purposes.

Mr. RANSDELL. I move the adoption of the conference report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The conference report has been read. The Senator from Louisiana moves its adoption.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, when this report was last presented I objected to its consideration because of the phraseology of two of its clauses. For some reason the impression arose that I designed to object to its adoption to submit an extended discussion of it. Such is not my intention. I am quite aware that the report, having been agreed upon after very considerable deliberation, will in all probability be adopted, yet I think the disposition that may be made of this vast sum of money under the provisions of the conference report should have prompted them to hedge the interests of the Government by more careful restrictions, and particularly in view of some of the reported experiences due to the advance of money by this same board in other directions.

No doubt the Shipping Board, in the exercise of their authority and for the purpose of securing rapid construction of ships, have had to take many chances in advancing of money upon contracts. Perhaps they should not have done so. I do not question their motives, but I think if the board as a trustee of some private interest, or acting on their own account, had been confronted with the duty of making such advances, they would have exacted greater security and insisted upon better safeguards for the lender. The same thing may be said of some of the other departments, and I therefore hoped that when this bill was finally reported these experiences of the recent past would have been considered and more appropriate and better legislation proposed.

This bill, Mr. President, is designed to meet a very urgent necessity, and of course it should become a law as soon as possible. Those engaged in the construction of ships must be sheltered, and in the absence of any other agency for constructing shelter the Government must in this crisis assume that responsibility. But this conference report authorizes the Shipping Board—to purchase, lease, requisition, including the requisition of the temporary use of, or acquire by condemnation or otherwise, any improved or unimproved lands or any interest therein suitable for the construction thereon of houses for the use of employees and the families of employees of shipyards in which ships are being constructed for the United States.

Mr. President, I do not think it is a wise policy to expend any of the public money in erecting structures upon leased lands. The probable total loss consequent upon that method of construction I think is apparent. After the war shall have ended and the activities of these shipyards shall have subsided or very largely decreased, the owners of the land will very naturally acquire the structures which the Government has placed upon them under its leases, and it makes no difference what the terms and conditions of the contract of lease may be; it is inevitable. But if the Government owned the realty, if it were its own land upon which the structures rested, the loss, while considerable, would not be complete. The making of leases for short time in these days of hurried construction, will necessarily redound very much more to the benefit of the owners of the land than to the Shipping Board or the Government which it represents.

This bill very properly gives the right of condemnation, and that power should be exercised in conjunction with the power to purchase the sites for these structures. When the Government provides for condemnation the proceedings, unless the act specifically provides the method, are those provided by the statutes of the States where the premises are situated upon which the right is to be exercised, and all these statutes in the States that I can now recall make provision, in the event the condemnor and the condemnee can not agree upon an adequate price, that the condemnor upon the deposit of a certain sum to be fixed by the court may take possession and go ahead with the accomplishment of the purpose for which the condemnation is to be exercised without waiting until a jury or a commission shall have determined the final amount of compensation and make the proper award.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of New Mexico in the chair). The Senator from Colorado will suspend while the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 3714) to provide further for the national security and defense, and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to provide credits for industries and enterprises in the United States necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and it will be so ordered.

Mr. THOMAS. So, the Government is amply armed with power for immediate construction if its authority be confined to purchase and condemnation, and does away with the dangerous leasing system under which there is apt to be considerable abuse and a total loss of the money expended upon it, without regard to the good faith of the board in its exercise.

My second objection, Mr. President, goes to subdivision (d) of the report, under which the Emergency Board is empowered "to make loans to persons, firms, or corporations in such manner, upon such terms and security, and for such time not exceeding 10 years, as it may determine to provide houses and facilities for the employees and the families of employees of such shipyards."

That, Mr. President, is the substance and perhaps the exact phraseology of similar provisions in other laws we have enacted, and appropriating money for various constructive governmental purposes. I am not prepared, nor would it be just if I were, to pronounce any opinion upon what is called the Hog Island exposé. I do not yet know enough about it to speak intelligently. But I think it may be fairly said that the sensational disclosures which are reported to have been made concerning it have been the outgrowth of a system of advances under such terms and upon such securities as the board in its discretion may exact.

In making advances to contractors our laws should safeguard the Government as completely as possible, and specify the minimum value of security upon which the advances are to be made. The Government does not in the ordinary transactions in times of peace take any chances upon the advancement of money. Many instances have occurred since this war began in which contracts have been given by the proper Government officials to this, that, and the other individual or corporation, followed by tremendous advances of money to the contractee upon the security of the contract only. Such, at least, is my information.

Now, any man of ordinary business experience must disapprove of that method of public financing. The Government furnishes the security by making the contract, and then accepts that security in many instances as the only visible evidence of anything which it has to safeguard its advance. I have heard of instances in which men have secured contracts for the manufacture of much-needed war supplies who have had no facilities whatever for their manufacture at the time of its execution, and in many of these instances the Government doubtless had, or should have had, knowledge of that fact; yet it has advanced tremendous sums of money under those circumstances. If there were no other methods of securing what the Government needs such a practice would be justified, but there are too many manufacturers in the country, Mr. President, and too many of them desirous of serving the Government to justify the suggestion.

I predict that when this conference report is adopted in many instances it will be followed by the making of contracts to men who have no facilities whatever for the performance of the work required, and to whom large sums of money will be advanced to enable them to so equip themselves. The very fact that such a practice is possible is the greatest inducement that can be offered to adventurers to make their bids, to get their contracts, secure what advances they can, and then sell their contracts to some substantial party.

We know, not officially, but many of us actually know, that contracts for enormous amounts of material and calling for enormous payments by the Government have been made to men without any facilities whatsoever for production, who, after obtaining their advances, have assigned their contracts to competent parties at a very liberal profit to themselves.

This subsection, therefore, Mr. President, should have provided in effect that this board should be empowered to make loans to persons, firms, or corporations upon such terms and securities exclusive of the contract itself, and in value equal to three-fourths at least of the amount of money advanced as a condition precedent to the arrangement. But nothing of the kind here appears, and my prediction is that in carrying this act into effect the Senate Committee on Commerce, or some other committee, will in the course of a few months be investigating other cases of extravagant expenditures and of advances made to men destitute of equipment, and some with only inadequate facilities for performing their duties under the agreement. This proposed law as it stands is merely an inducement to the average man who has nothing to lose and everything to gain to secure contracts, make something out of them, and pass them on. Indeed, it is the one inducement not only for making the contract but a powerful force for its subsequent assignment to an efficient concern.

Mr. President, I do not think we should legislate for the Nation in any manner different from that in which we transact our own business with regard to the same subject. I do not believe that any board however honest, however capable, should be given control over an appropriation of millions upon millions of dollars and then endowed with a loose authority to spend it practically as they see fit. It inevitably leads to waste, to loss, to confusion, and in nine cases out of ten to scandal and corruption.

These are my objections, Mr. President, to the conference report, and I hope, although the hope is doubtless a vain one, that the conference report will be rejected and the Senate conferees requested to confer further with the conferees of the House. We may thus obtain a bill so framed as to safeguard the interests of the Government.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. THOMAS. I was about to yield the floor.

Mr. McCUMBER. Are not the fatal deficiencies of which the Senator speaks in the bill as it passed the House and the Senate, and not necessarily due to any action or failure of action on the part of the conferees.

Mr. THOMAS. The laws which we have passed heretofore have, as to this subject, been framed substantially as this conference report has been framed, and it may be that the bill contained this phraseology before it reached that committee. But, Mr. President, since the passage of the previous laws and the present time there have been many exposés, or partial exposés, involving instances of loose advances of money without adequate security to men who have been fortunate to make contracts with the Government that we should profit by that experience, in whose school only can a certain class of men learn. Whether the bill as framed contains these recitals or not, the duty is before us to take to heart the lesson which these investigations have brought to us and see to it, as far as we can, that in future legislation the possibility of their occurrence will be reduced to a minimum.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I share with the Senator from Colorado some misgivings as to the working out of this house-building program. I have watched, as other Senators have, the development of our system of awarding contracts for ships, munitions, and supplies of different character. I have observed that vast sums of money have been wasted through what we are pleased to call our cost plus system of contracts, whether they were based on a percentage of profit on the cost or on the cost plus lump-sum profit.

Under the provisions of many of these contracts the Government supplies the money necessary to carry on the work, guarantees the delivery of materials, assists in obtaining an adequate supply of labor, and now is about to undertake to provide housing facilities for the employees, takes over the negotiations with labor as to wages and conditions of employment, and in general performs nearly all of those functions which in an ordinary contract serve to earn for the contractor a profit. He is left with the responsibility for furnishing the technical knowledge and directing organization necessary for the carrying on the work, and for that he is guaranteed a profit which in many cases would be highly satisfactory even if all the risks and responsibilities of an ordinary contract were involved.

There is another very bad feature of this form of contract as it works out in actual practice. The contractor is relieved of all anxiety as to possible financial losses through faulty organization, bad management, inefficient superintendence, the employment of unskilled labor, and all the thousand and one things which once established make it impossible to turn out good work in fair quantity. This condition inevitably works for the employment of men in important posts with small reference to their qualifications, in the prodigal use of labor and materials rather than in skillful planning for their most advantageous use, and in a general carelessness about paying unfair prices for materials, equipment, and labor. The details of all this are known only to those whose daily work brings them into contact with such problems, but the extent to which a big organization can, and almost invariably does, go to pieces when the spur of financial responsibility for results is removed is almost beyond the layman's belief. As an old-time contractor for road work once said, "I don't know how it is, but when we have a percentage contract the very mules seem to know it, and work accordingly."

But I think, Mr. President, we have covered the situation in this report about as well as could be done under the circumstances.

I say again, and I speak, too, as one who has had some experience in housebuilding, if I had charge of this program, I would bend every effort to construct all of these houses on a competitive contract basis. I am of the opinion that in nearly every community men could be found who would bid in competition for the furnishing of both the labor and the material for the construction of the buildings needed for the housing of our workmen.

The Shipping Board seems to feel that it is hardly possible to obtain bids under the present circumstances. So this report has been drawn permitting the awarding of contracts by competitive bidding and also allowing them to be done as indicated in the last paragraph of the report.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] has referred to the question of leasing property for the building of structures. From my talk with members on the Shipping Board I am under the impression that that is only to be done where the necessities of the occasion demand and where temporary structures of a moderate cost are to be erected, not where buildings of a real permanent character are to be built.

An organization is being created in this home-construction bureau who, I believe, understand their business. It is true the gentleman in charge has had little experience, but he has surrounded himself with some very practical men.

The Senator from Colorado refers to the first paragraph on the second page of the report. As I understand the language of that paragraph it is proposed that the Shipping Board shall loan to shipbuilders the money to build these homes. Unless the Shipping Board have changed the rule recently established they will not loan money to anyone other than the shipbuilder and for homes in the immediate vicinity of his yard.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator will permit me, the terms of subsection (d) are so broad as to include any person, any firm, or any corporation in such a manner, upon such terms, and so forth. I hope the Senator's inference is right. I hope that the power will only be exercised in behalf of an actual shipbuilder. I would like to see it so limited, but as it is the advance can be made to anyone fortunate enough to obtain a contract of any sort with the Shipping Board.

Mr. CALDER. There is no doubt the language is broad enough to be utilized in the manner indicated by the Senator from Colorado, but it is the purpose of the Shipping Board, as explained to me, to loan money only to the men who own and operate the shipyards. It is their expectation that in nearly every case they can work out a plan by which the Government will be enabled to advance the money to provide for the construction of the buildings, and that the Government itself will then sell the buildings, taking back from the purchaser a mortgage for the amount of the Government investment, these mortgages to be paid off in installments running over a period of 10 years.

It will be impossible to put into effect a scheme of that character in all places, but it is the intention of the Shipping Board to follow this general plan wherever possible.

Mr. President, I believe under all the circumstances that this conference report covers the situation completely, and I am hopeful that ultimately we can evolve a scheme of home building that will bring back to the Government practically all its investment in the project. If the money is used discreetly, if the contracts are made with care, and by those who understand the building of houses, the Government will simply be loaning its credit. If we are going to obtain the right sort of labor for our shipbuilding work we must see to it that our men are properly housed; and there is no other way to do it than by passing a measure of this character.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] falls into an error in trying to apply, in time of war and very great stress, the principles which ordinarily should govern men in their business methods in normal times. We are building ships now under very great stress. The universal cry for the safe conduct and prosecution of the war is ships, and more ships, and then more ships. We are doing everything possible as a Nation to expedite the building of these ships. In pursuing that task we find that in a number of the shipyards there are insufficient houses for the employees.

It goes without saying that in a Nation like ours, which has not been for the past 50 years a maritime Nation, there were not many shipyards when the war broke out 3½ years ago. In order to construct a shipyard you must have a good big piece of vacant ground, in order to build the large houses of various kinds that are needed, the great ways on which the ships themselves are constructed, and that vacant ground must lie on a watercourse where the water is deep. It must be in the locality of some city where there are a great many people living, where there is plenty of electricity and motive power of different kinds. A great many things like that must exist in order to make an effective shipyard.

Now, the Shipping Board followed or tried to follow those conditions, and did do it as nearly as possible. The shipyards are located throughout the country in the vicinity of considerable centers of population. But the laborers must get to the yards, and get there quickly, if they are going to do effective work. Even if a yard be 3 miles from the outskirts of a city, as the Hog Island yard, to which the Senator referred, on the banks of the Delaware River, 3 miles from the city of Philadelphia, it is difficult to prepare transportation facilities speedily for 30,000 people, and that yard contemplates using fully 30,000 men. I was there yesterday as one of the Senate committee, and we were told there were between 15,000 and 20,000 people then at work on the yard, and it is now in an incomplete condition. When finished it will employ fully 30,000 people. To convey 30,000 people even 3 miles from the edge of the city of Philadelphia or from the center of population of the city, a distance of 7 to 8 miles, requires a great many car lines, and those car lines do not exist. It is deemed essential, in order to make a success of that particular shipyard, that a very large number of workmen live on the ground or very near the ground, within walking distance, so they will not have to waste from half an hour to an hour to get to their work in the morning and return from their work at night. They can do much more effective service if they are on the ground or near it.

There are some shipyards, in fact a good many of them, which are not as close as we would like to centers of population, where in order to get the laborers it is absolutely necessary to build houses for them. Whatever may be the theory of the Shipping Board, it is up against the practical proposition that if it can not get the houses it can not build the ships, and if we can not build the ships we can not win the war. So we must give the Shipping Board these houses if we expect to win the war.

The Senator says that subsection (d), of which he seems to complain particularly, ought to be amended. It authorizes the Shipping Board "to make loans to persons, firms, or corporations in such manner upon such terms and security," and he would add "exclusive of the contract itself, at least to the extent of three-fourths of the security."

I can say to the Senator that the committee first contemplated requiring absolute security, but we were confronted with the proposition that if an individual were going to build houses now with the expectation of selling them after the war at the present cost price he would be up against a very hard proposition. Everything is high now. Labor is costing twice as much as it did before the war. Material of every kind is costing twice as much. The Government will be very lucky, I should say, to receive finally 50 per cent of the cost of these houses.

This is emergency work, Senators. It is not a normal business proposition. It can not be conducted in an ordinary business manner. We must do the best we can with a difficult situation, and in dealing with it the bill proposes to place in the hands of the Shipping Board $50,000,000 and to allow it to expend whatever part of the $50,000,000 may be necessary, or the whole if necessary, in constructing houses for laborers in the various plants of the country, and in doing that to take such security as it may be able to get for those houses, and to handle this business in the very best possible manner.

In order that the Senate may see what the Shipping Board contemplates, I should like to read a letter from Mr. Piez addressed to the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], the chairman of the Commerce Committee, which was written at the instance of the Senator from Florida and myself on the 22d of this month. It reads:

DEAR SENATOR: It is imperative in order to speed up our present shipbuilding program that existing yards be manned to their capacity, not only for a single shift but for two or even three shifts per day.

Senators, if we are going to win this war we certainly have got to get to three shifts per day, for we are not building ships now anything like as fast as the submarines are destroying them—

Unfortunately many of our yards are located in communities the housing facilities of which are already completely absorbed by men engaged in war work. Private enterprise has in these communities signally failed to provide the additional housing required; in fact, the normal increases in housing facilities had practically ceased through the extraordinary increases in costs of raw materials before the Emergency Fleet Corporation came into being.

Let me remind Senators that at the Hog Island shipbuilding plant 30,000 workers normally mean an addition to the city of Philadelphia and vicinity of at least 120,000 souls. Certainly for every worker there are at least four persons. That would be 120,000 people. All the houses of Philadelphia and vicinity now are occupied. No real estate man is going to build houses at the present time expecting to make money on them. He can not afford to pay the carpenters and other workmen and the high prices of all materials at the present time and expect to make money on them. So the Shipping Board, in order to operate and to carry on the work at this great Hog Island plant, must in some way provide for housing 120,000 human beings. Men are not going to go there and work very well unless their families are with them. This communication continues:

We have done everything possible to force a greater absorption of new workers, both by enlisting the interest of the community in the task and by encouraging and directing the improvement of existing transportation facilities—

We were told yesterday that at Hog Island the board had contracted to furnish 100 cars to a street railway. The street railway is going to build an extra line, and the Shipping Board will furnish 100 additional cars in order that the operatives may get to their work quickly—but what has been accomplished from these efforts is insignificant compared with our total needs. Government aid must be rendered in one of two ways—

I ask the attention of the Senate carefully to this. This letter is from Mr. Piez—

First, the Government can own and operate as a landlord.
Second, the Government can join private interests, letting these interests furnish as much of the funds as present financial conditions render possible, the Government furnishing the remainder under such safeguards, terms, and conditions as it may determine. Housing of a temporary character, but suitable for the purpose, will be provided for single men wherever possible.

We saw yesterday at Hog Island a number of single men asleep in barracks, which had already been provided for them—cheap, temporary structures. The men we saw asleep were those who had worked at night; they were not working on day shifts. They slept when we were there in comfortable barracks, which, however, were very temporary and not suitable for families. So Mr. Piez says:

Housing of a temporary character, but suitable for the purpose, will be provided for single men wherever possible, but housing of a more permanent type must be provided for the large number of skilled mechanics who can not be drawn into the yards if they are required to separate themselves from their families. The Fleet Corporation is convinced that Government aid must be rendered if the yards are to be adequately and quickly manned, and has decided wherever possible to work along the lines indicated in the second alternative—

The second alternative being as indicated above, that the Government will cooperate with private interests, getting the private interests to help wherever possible, and that the Government will receive the very best security obtainable for these funds—

We have been ready to proceed for more than six weeks to meet this absolutely essential need, but are powerless to proceed without enabling legislation.

We are convinced that it is to the Government's interest in most cases to lend the money rather than to undertake the construction on its own account, and we should consider it a misfortune if the provisions of section D, S. 3389, were modified or eliminated. For your information I am attaching a memorandum indicating the lines on which we expect to proceed in the case of loans made by the Government. It is understood, of course, that this memorandum may be subject to modifications if individual cases require them.

Very truly, yours,

CHARLES PIEZ,
Vice President and General Manager.

Now, in order that the Senate may know exactly what the Shipping Board contemplates and the practical working of the plan under which this money will be expended, I will read this memorandum, which is very interesting:

The following method of making advances to corporations to secure the construction of homes for shipyards employees, in accordance with the provisions of bill S. 3389, as amended by conference, has been approved.

1. Unless unavoidable, it will not be the policy of the Emergency Fleet Corporation to requisition land, nor to take title thereto in its name, nor to appear as owner or lessee of any development or subdivision thereof.

2. The plan employed shall be uniform in its application to all shipyards and all localities.

3. The shipbuilding company, hereafter called the "parent company"—

Of course, Senators understand that is the company that is building the ships at the given yard—

shall contribute the land or the value of the land, if the same be requisitioned by the Emergency Fleet Corporation, and the same shall be free and clear of all liens and incumbrances. If for any sufficient reason an existing lien can not be disposed of at the time of acquisition of title the parent company shall guarantee removal of same without resort to the land.

4. The parent company shall organize a realty and construction company, hereafter called the subsidiary company, whose charter shall meet with the requirements of the State where the development is contemplated, and shall be further approved by the Emergency Fleet Corporation, and whose capital stock shall not exceed the actual cash paid for the land to be improved, or if the land be already owned, then the actual cash value thereof at the commencement of the operation and such value shall be approved by the Emergency Fleet Corporation. The parent company shall convey such lands to the subsidiary company with full warranty of title.

An agreement shall be entered into between the parent company and the subsidiary company for the contemplated development by the subsidiary and the advance of the entire cost of the improvement and overhead charges during construction by the parent company. This contract shall contain all requirements of the Emergency Fleet Corporation and be generally approved by it as to form. While essentially uniform all such contracts must be adapted to the particular requirements of the law of the State where the development is undertaken.

I ask especially the attention of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] to this clause:

The subsidiary—

That is, the company that is actually going to build the houses on land that it owns—

6. The subsidiary shall give its note or bond for all advance and the same shall provide for repayment by or before 10 years. Such evidence of indebtedness shall be secured by a building and permanent blanket mortgage covering the entire development and all improvements thereon, which shall be made for the maximum amount which the Emergency Fleet Corporation shall estimate it will be required to advance for the completion of the development, the mortgage to be made by the subsidiary to the parent company.

7. Bond and mortgage provided in preceding paragraph shall be assigned by the parent company to the Emergency Fleet Corporation, together with the entire capital stock of the subsidiary company as additional collateral security.

8. The Emergency Fleet Corporation shall agree to make all advances, but shall reserve to itself the right to determine whether the subsidiary shall undertake to do all or any of the work of development or construction, let the contracts therefor in whole or in part, or whether the Emergency Fleet Corporation shall itself undertake the acquisition of the necessary material and labor, let all contracts therefor, or employ a combination of these methods. In other words, the Emergency Fleet Corporation shall have absolute control as to the general layout, type of improvements, and method of construction to be employed.

9. The parent company shall guarantee the performance of all covenants and conditions on the part of the subsidiary to be performed, as contained in said building-loan agreement and accompanying bond and mortgage, except that it shall not thereby be construed as obligating itself upon the bond nor rendering itself liable for any deficiency subsequently arising by reason of the fact that the values created by the aforesaid land and improvements are not sufficient to secure the full repayment of the amounts of money advanced by the Emergency Fleet Corporation. Its guaranty, however, shall be so worded as to require it to see that the subsidiary faithfully applies all moneys received by it in accordance with the contract, and also require it to indemnify the Emergency Fleet Corporation by reason of any lien filed subsequent to the making of the mortgage, but which might have priority over all subsequent advances, except where the Fleet Corporation shall itself undertake the work or let the contract.

10. The land and mortgage shall bear interest at 5 per cent per annum, payable semiannually, and shall contain a provision for an annual amortization installment of 3 per cent, which shall be constant in application and to which there shall be no offset by reason of releases, except that such installment will only be payable if the subsidiary company has in its treasury money sufficient to pay the same after payment of ordinary running expenses, taxes, assessments, interest on mortgage, and any overdue prior installment. If and when the mortgage has been reduced to 75 per cent of the value of the property still securing the same, an equal amount of land shall be released upon payment of all such subsequent installments. It shall also contain proper provision for the release of lots with improvements upon a contemplated sale and the acceptance by the Emergency Fleet Corporation of a new mortgage containing provisions at least as favorable to the Emergency Fleet Corporation as the original mortgage and for the ultimate repayment at a date not more distant than the said blanket mortgage. The value placed upon the release and to be credited upon the blanket mortgage shall be the amount of the purchase money mortgage to be accepted in lieu thereof or the cash received to the value of the mortgage thereon.

11. The Emergency Fleet Corporation shall have the right to fix the price and terms of all lots to be sold and all rentals where leased. It may require the imposition of restrictions on all or part of the property and shall control the utilization of every portion of the property for business purposes in such manner as it may determine, with the object of preventing the exploitation of laborers housed upon such development.

12. With the consent of the Emergency Fleet Corporation the subsidiary may require releases from the mortgage of any land intended for use as streets, park sites, schools, churches, or other public improvement; but in such event there shall be a dedication to the public or other use which does not permit of profit.

13. There shall be an examination of title and certification thereof to the Emergency Fleet Corporation satisfactory to it.

14. The subsidiary shall be permitted to pay dividends not exceeding 5 per cent per annum, provided such amount shall be earned and after payment of all taxes, assessments, interest, amortization installments, or other obligations required of the subsidiary until the aforesaid mortgage shall be fully paid and discharged, whereupon the subsidiary shall be permitted to pay 6 per cent per annum and to set aside an additional 2 per cent per annum for the cancellation of an equal amount of its outstanding stock, until such outstanding stock shall be reduced to, say, 10 per cent of its original issue. All moneys earned by the subsidiary in excess of the aforesaid payments shall be employed by it for the general improvement of the property and for the benefit of the occupants of the homes thereon in perpetuity.

15. At the time of the assignment of the mortgage to the Emergency Fleet Corporation the subsidiary shall execute and deliver what is commonly known as an estoppel certificate to the effect that there are no counterclaims to said mortgage.

16. The mortgages accepted from purchasers in exchange for releases shall be made to the subsidiary company and assigned by it to the Fleet Corporation. In the event a foreclosure thereof shall become necessary the Fleet Corporation may, at its option, reassign any such mortgage so to be foreclosed, to the subsidiary company, which shall conduct such foreclosure in its own name but as agent for the Fleet Corporation.

A. ROGERS FLANNERY, Director.

Mr. President, in conclusion let me say that your Committee on Commerce examined this measure with the greatest care; they studied it closely; they did not act hastily upon it, and were unanimous in their final action. After having passed the Senate the bill was passed by the House; then conferees were appointed; and the conferees of the Senate and of the House, after a full, fair, and painstaking discussion, came to a unanimous agreement. They believe that the bill as presented by them is in the very best possible form. It certainly is necessary, if we are going to build ships, and I earnestly hope the Senate will ratify the report of the conferees.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator before he takes his seat if it is a fact that the provision to which the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] especially objects was not in the bill as it passed the Senate?

Mr. RANSDELL. It was not in the bill as it passed the Senate; it was put in by the House, and the Senate conferees have agreed to it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator ought to qualify that statement, because it has been considerably changed from the form in which it passed the House.

Mr. RANSDELL. I have the bill——

Mr. SMOOT. I will refer to it.

Mr. RANSDELL. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. SMOOT. I have the floor.

Mr. RANSDELL. I ask the Senator if he will not permit me, as he has called in question my statement, to read the provision as it passed the House?

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will wait a moment, the Senator from Utah will read it himself.

Mr. RANSDELL. Very well; if the Senator from Utah is going to read it.

Mr. SMOOT. I was going to say——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has not yet recognized anyone except the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. SMOOT. I understood the Senator from Louisiana had taken his seat.

Mr. RANSDELL. Then, if I am recognized, I should like to answer the suggestion of the Senator from Utah. The provision passsed the House in this form:

(d) To make loans upon adequate security to persons, firms, or corporations, but for no longer term than 10 years, in such manner and upon such terms as it may determine from time to time to provide houses for the employees of such shipyards.

When the measure got into conference, that was amended.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think the Senator is mistaken in that. The Senator has read the provision, as I understand, as the conferees have changed it.

Mr. RANSDELL. No; I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Here is the way it was, at least when reported to the House——

Mr. RANSDELL. I am speaking of it, I will say to the Senator from Washington, as it passed the House.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have tried to get a copy of the bill as it passed the House.

Mr. RANSDELL. I will send to the Senator a copy of the bill as it passed the House and as it was sent to conference.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will read it, then, as it was reported to the House.

Mr. RANSDELL. It was changed on the floor of the House.

Mr. JONES of Washington. As originally reported to the House it read:

To make loans to persons, firms, or corporations in such manner and upon such terms as it may determine from time to time to provide houses for the employees of such shipyards.

Mr. RANSDELL. It was changed on the floor of the House. I will send the Senator a copy of the bill as it passed the House.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I see the Senator is correct. The bill apparently was not printed as it passed the House.

Mr. RANSDELL. The conferees made some change in that. This is the form in which it was agreed to by the conferees:

(d) To make loans to persons, firms, or corporations in such manner upon such terms and security and for such time, not exceeding 10 years, as it may determine, to provide houses and facilities for the employees and the families of employees of such shipyards.

That is substantially the same as the House provision.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I did not intend to take any time upon this report, for I think the objections to it have been pretty well covered. This is only another case of legislating in conference, a practice that is growing to an alarming extent, and I do not believe that it is going to be discontinued until the Senate itself puts its stamp of disapproval upon that method of legislating. If Senators will only take the conference report, examine that report, and compare it with the bill as it passed the House and the Senate, respectively, they will find that there is not one of its paragraphs that has not been changed, and changed materially, by the addition of new matter not considered by either the House or the Senate.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield for a question?

Mr. SMOOT. I will yield in a moment to the Senator.

Mr. President, this is not the only bill which the conferees have changed from the form in which it passed the Senate or the House so that one can hardly recognize any resemblance to the measure as passed by the Senate or by the House, but under our rules we have either got to approve this report as a whole or disapprove of it as a whole. No one is objecting to the appropriation of money for the building of the necessary houses adjacent to shipbuilding yards.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. I want to state to the Senator that I have proposed an amendment to the rules, which I am informed a subcommittee of that committee has been authorized to report. If the rule shall be amended as suggested by me then this kind of a conference report may be defeated on a point of order.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am in full accord with the proposed amendment to the rules suggested by the Senator from Kansas. I hope that it will be reported to the Senate at an early date, and that there will not be a dissenting voice in the Senate when it comes up for consideration.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, being a member of the subcommittee having that matter in charge, I think I am fully justified in saying that that amendment to the rules will be reported in the near future. I regret that it was not reported before this conference report came in, because this is an illustration of the abuse that has grown up in connection with conference reports.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield for a question?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. RANSDELL. The Senator has stated that all of the provisions of this bill have been changed by the conferees.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I did not.

Mr. RANSDELL. The Senator has tried to make the Senate believe that material changes have been made. I ask the Senator to kindly point out the changes that have been made, because I say to him—and I was a member of the conference committee—that I do not see how conferees could have more fully complied with the spirit of the rule. I do not believe in conferees legislating, but if the Senator will point out now the material changes that have been made I will thank him very much.

Mr. SMOOT. If I wanted to take the time of the Senate, I could do so as to every paragraph of the bill, as I have stated.

Mr. RANSDELL. If the Senator does not wish to be unjust, I wish he would take that time.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will only give me time, I will take it. Read paragraph (a) and see what has been added to it. As the bill passed the House it read:

(a) To purchase, lease, requisition, or acquire by condemnation or otherwise any improved or unimproved land or any interest therein suitable for the construction thereon of houses for the use of employees of shipyards in which ships are being constructed for the United States.

As the conferees reported back to us, it reads as follows:

(a) To purchase, lease, requisition, including the requisition of the temporary use of—

The words "including the requisition of the temporary use of" have been added—or acquire by condemnation or otherwise any improved or unimproved land or any interest therein suitable for the construction thereon of houses for the use of employees and the families of employees of shipyards in which ships are being constructed for the United States.

The words "and the families of employees" have also been added.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if there is much difference between "the families of employees" and "the employees," and if the language incorporated is not designed to carry out merely the proper idea?

Mr. SMOOT. There is quite a difference.

Mr. RANSDELL. Are we going to furnish housing for the employees and not for the families of the employees?

Mr. SMOOT. If there was no difference, the conferees never would have put that language in the conference report.

Mr. RANSDELL. We were trying to perfect it.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, yes; that is always the excuse offered.

Mr. RANSDELL. That is exactly what conferees are for.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, Mr. President, I deny that. The conferees appointed by the Senate and the House are to consider the bill as passed by the House and as passed by the Senate and agree upon the wording either adopted by the House or the Senate, but no rule of the Senate and no rule of the other House authorizes the conferees to add anything in a conference report that was not originally contained in the bill as passed by the House or as passed by the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Utah a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does the Senator mean to tell me that the conferees have gone to the extent of taking a bill which provided for the housing of employees—and we know they must have some place where they can sleep and rest at the shipyards, a place, possibly, where 10 men could be put in one building—and so changed it that the employees can bring their families—their wives and their children, and any number of children—to the shipyards and house them there at Government expense?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator that under the wording of this conference report there is no telling what authority is given. The conferees have not only added what I have already indicated, but they have added in paragraph

(c) "and all necessary and convenient facilities incidental thereto."

Mr. McCUMBER. I am simply astounded.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am only calling attention to these matters now because a Senator, a member of the conference committee, asked me to do so. I might go through every one of the paragraphs in the conference report exactly as I have done in the one instance and call the attention of the Senate to what has been added in each particular case, but I do not want to take the time of the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. What is the connection between the last clause which the Senator read, namely, the words "and all necessary and convenient facilities incidental thereto," and what precedes it?

Mr. SMOOT. It occurs in this connection. The paragraph reads:

(c) To purchase, lease, requisition, including the requisition of the temporary use of, or acquire by condemnation or otherwise any houses or other buildings for the use of such employees and their families, together with the land on which the same are erected, or any interest therein, all necessary and proper fixtures and furnishings therefor—

Then follow the words—and all necessary and convenient facilities incidental thereto.

Mr. BORAH. I understand the Senator is objecting to housing the families of employees?

Mr. SMOOT. Not at all. What I am objecting to is that the conferees have legislated by putting in matter that was passed neither by the Senate nor by the House; that is all that I am complaining of at this time.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSDELL. Will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Colorado, although I should like to proceed.

Mr. RANSDELL. I am surprised that the Senator declines to yield to the Senator in charge of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will wait a moment I will yield to him. I have yielded to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. With the permission of the Senator from Utah, I will yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Colorado first asked me to yield, and I yield first to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. In view of the fact that the Senator in charge of the bill thinks that he has precedence, I will take my seat so that he may make his inquiry now.

Mr. RANSDELL. I thank the Senator from Colorado.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. RANSDELL. The Senator has criticized paragraphs (a) and (b), on page 1 of the bill, and has tried to make it appear that a great legislative crime has been committed by the conferees in charge of this bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I yielded to the Senator for a question.

Mr. RANSDELL. I want to ask the Senator if he will let me read these two sections to the Senate, so that the Senate may see whether or not they have been changed?

Mr. SMOOT. I will read the two sections, Mr. President.

Mr. RANSDELL. Let me read them, if you please.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah declines to yield further.

Mr. RANSDELL. All right, if the Senator is afraid for me to read them and explain them.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator will have all the time he wants to read them and explain them afterwards. I would have been through long ago if the Senator had not interrupted so much.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. My purpose in rising was to call the attention of the Senator from Utah to a still further significant provision of subsection (c). It may or may not have been inserted by the committee of conference. I refer to the clause which gives to the board power to furnish "all necessary and proper fixtures and furnishings," and I ask the Senator whether that does not include the power to furnish as well as to erect these structures under the provisions of the conference report?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that was in the bill as it passed the House, so the conferees could not be criticized in any way for putting that provision in the conference report.

Mr. THOMAS. The point which I make is not so much against the committee of conference as the fact that after the bill has passed here provision is made now for extending its operations to the furnishing as well as to the construction of these houses.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. President, the only object I had in rising to speak upon this report was to call attention to an evil that has been growing for the last five or six years and that I intended to call to the attention of the Senate, and one other question, and then take my seat.

Mr. President, I would a thousand times prefer to have Congress authorize this board to erect the buildings, if necessary furnish the buildings, have absolute control of the buildings, the Government have a clear title to the buildings, take no mortgage upon the buildings, and let the employees live in the buildings under the direct control of the officials of the War Department, rather than provide that money shall be advanced and secured by mortgages upon lands, to lend money not exceeding 10 years for the purpose of erecting buildings, and then, Mr. President, when Government work ceased at the close of the war, let the Government sell the property for what it will bring. I agree with the Senator that there is no question but that the Government is going to lose money. There is no doubt about it. We would if we erected the buildings and sold the buildings. We would have the land left. We could sell that; and, if it were purchased at a fair price to-day, when there is no particuar need for the houses and the plants are not working as they will be working during the war, the price of the real estate will drop and we will not get 50 cents on the dollar for it.

That is not what I am complaining of at all. I believe that it would have been better to have provided that we would purchase the lands necessary for building these homes for the employees, that we would build the buildings for them, that we would furnish them, and that we would give the use of them to the employees that work in the shipbuilding yards for the purpose of building ships during this crisis.

Nobody knows now when this work will cease. Under the provisions of this bill we will have in Washington a bureau handling securities for 10 years to come. No one can tell what the expense will be; but if we had given the authority for erecting these buildings and purchasing the land and furnishing them, we could have closed up the whole thing in a short time after the termination of this war. We would not have had to collect on mortgages, nor try to collect from men that are interested in buildings with the Government of the United States. The Senators know that whenever there is a bureau established in this Government it is a mighty hard thing to have it cease to exist.

Mr. KING. Bureaus are immortal.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the criticism that I would have made upon the bill on its passage; but that is out of the question now. I simply wanted to call attention to the fact that I shall welcome the day, and hope it will soon be here, when legislation upon conference reports will cease.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I think it is a very great public calamity that the Senator from Utah did not frame this bill and tell us just how it should be fixed. The House committee did the best it could with it, and the Commerce Committee of the Senate did its best, and it is the result of the united labor of these two committees. I am sorry it does not satisfy the Senator from Utah.

The Senator has criticized the conferees, it seems to me, with undue harshness, because he says that we have materially changed the bill as it passed the House. You heard me ask him please to specify. Why, even a common murderer, Mr. President, is entitled to have a copy of the indictment served upon him, stating that on such a day, in such a place, he did kill and murder so-and-so. Here the conferees of the great United States Senate are charged with a legislative crime and no bill of particulars is furnished.

In answer to my inquiry as to the improper changes made by the conferees in the bill as it passed both Houses, the Senator referred only to paragraphs (a) and (b). Now, I will ask the careful attention of the Senate for just a very few minutes. I will first read paragraph (a) as the bill passed the House and then as it was agreed upon by the conferees.

I now read paragraph (a) as it passed the House:

To purchase, lease, requisition, or acquire by condemnation or otherwise any improved or unimproved land or any interest therein suitable for the construction thereon of houses for the use of employees of shipyards in which ships are being constructed for the United States.

That is the House provision. Here is the provision as reported by the conferees:

(a) To purchase, lease, requisition, including the requisition of the temporary use of, or acquire by condemnation or otherwise any improved or unimproved land or any interest therein suitable for the construction thereon of houses for the use of employees and the families of employees of shipyards in which ships are being constructed for the United States.

Yes; we did go to the extent of adding "families of employees," and we are told that you can not get the best class of employees for a great work like this, which is going to last probably for two or three years, unless they can have their families with them. It is entirely reasonable and proper to provide for the families of employees, and no right-thinking man should object to it. We can not build ships unless we have the highest type of mechanics, and such men are not willing to be separated from their families. We are providing for the temporary class of employees also.

I now read paragraph (b) as it passed the House:

To construct on such land for the use of such employees houses and all other necessary or convenient facilities upon such conditions and at such price as may be determined, and to sell, lease, or exchange such houses, land, and facilities upon such terms and conditions as it may determine.

That is the House provision. Here is the provision as the conferees reported it:

(b) To construct on such land for the use of such employees and their families houses and all other necessary or convenient facilities upon such conditions and at such price as may be determined by it, and to sell, lease, or exchange such houses, land, and facilities upon such terms and conditions as it may determine.

Mr. President, I insist you have to rake those two provisions with a fine-toothed comb to find any material difference between them, except that we did add a provision for the families of the employees.

The Senator from Utah did not discuss the balance of the bill, so I will not discuss it either, except to say that practically no changes were made in its provisions as passed by the House. The conferees on the part of the Senate found that the House had acted wisely and agreed to substantially everything inserted by it.

Senators, I will not take more of your time, but ask now for a vote on the conference report, unless there is some further debate.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I rise to submit one or two observations concerning this measure. Under normal conditions I would be very much opposed to the bill—the general theory of it as well as its details—and I am not satisfied, even in the circumstances of this hour, that this measure is wisely or properly framed. I want to call attention to one feature of the bill which certainly should challenge the attention of the Senate.

I find no provision limiting the number of employees of the Shipping Board who may be concerned in the activities imposed by this measure. There is no limitation upon the salaries or compensation to be paid to the officials and employees who may be called to serve in the execution of the provisions of this bill.

Mr. President, the departments, bureaus, agencies, and executive and administrative branches of the Government are bidding against each other for employees and creating a situation which amounts almost to a scandal. The increased compensation offered by one branch or agency results in taking from other departments the employees whose services are required therein, and many of whom have been there for years. I found a few days ago a young gentleman who had received a position at $1,200 a year and he was satisfied with that; but one of the departments, apparently having no limitation upon salaries to be paid its employees, offered him $2,500, and he left the former position and accepted the offer.

This policy is absolutely indefensible and, of course, tends to demoralize the Government service and to result in vicious inequalities and growing discontent among those working for the Government. This bill places no curb on this evil practice; indeed, it encourages it and tends to legalize it. There is no limitation as to the number of employees nor any restrictions upon their compensation.

We find that these bureaus, departments, and agencies, organized either for temporary purposes or otherwise, have no limitations placed upon them. The entire appropriation could be paid out for salaries and operating expenses. I protest against such loose and wasteful legislation. New men, zealous and perhaps rather proud of the authority given them, take hold of these new and novel undertakings and, being subjected to no limitations as to the number of employees or the compensation to be paid them, they attack the Government itself and take men and women away from the Treasury Department or the Post Office Department or some other department of the Government by offering larger salaries than those which the employees have been receiving. I think it is a very glaring evil and one which ought to receive some consideration at the hands of the Senate.

I mentioned to the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee some time ago that there ought to be some legislation that would fix the compensation paid to employees in the various departments and bureaus and agencies now being created. There are numbers of them, and their activities result in robbing old and established departments of trusted, confidential, and valuable employees. I call the attention of the Senator from Louisiana to the fact that this measure leaves the Government helpless and subject to this system, so unwise and vicious. The governing board, under this bill, may pay $3,000 or $4,000 or $5,000, or any number of dollars, annually to any employee whom they may call for service in carrying out the terms of this bill. It is so easy to vote away the money of the people. We must remember that all these enormous expenditures must be met, and they can only be met through taxation and bond issues. It is imperative that we scrupulously examine all appropriations and see to it that not one dollar is wasted or devoted to a questionable purpose. There is too much of a disposition upon the part of some to prey upon the Government. Constant demands are being made for increase in salaries, and thousands of employees are being added to the long list of those in the Government service. It is time we demanded economy in every branch of the service and restricted the number of employees to the smallest number possible compatible with efficiency.

Mr. President, I think it is a very unwise plan to devolve upon the Shipping Board the execution of the duties provided in this bill. Certainly there is nothing in its record justifying the belief that it will wisely or efficiently perform them. The senior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], when this bill was up for consideration, invited attention to the fact that before the war was over doubtless provision would have to be made for the housing of a large number of employees of the Government. Numerous plans are being submitted for caring for Government employees not only in shipyards but in the District of Columbia and at other places. It would seem that in the light of the facts, the proper thing to do is to create some bureau or department charged with the entire responsibility of housing the employees of the Government when the necessity exists.

We will soon have in other activities of the Government demands for appropriations for housing purposes, and some other bureau or board or department will be created for the erection of other houses for other employees, and so there will be divided authority, a multiplicity of officials devoting their activities to this same undertaking, and an unnecessary financial burden placed upon the Government. One set of officials could expend all sums appropriated for housing purposes as well as two or three or four sets of officials. If we have to make provision to house employees of the Government, then the matter is so important that a distinct bureau should be created, its powers should be clearly defined, and restrictions and limitations imposed as to the employees and the compensation to be paid them.

Mr. President, I think, when we were considering this bill and before its passage, we should have dealt with this question in a broad and comprehensive manner. But we did not do so; we dealt with the subject in a piecemeal fashion. We will have patchwork and unwise legislation as a result. I do not know that it would be wise, in the light of the exigency now confronting us, and in view of the fact that this bill has passed the Senate and the House and the conferees have agreed, that this conference report should be rejected, but certainly this legislation is very imperfect, very defective, and, in my opinion, will impose upon the Government great loss and will not accomplish the good which is contemplated.

I agree with the most of the observations made by my colleague [Mr. SMOOT]. The Government is not going to receive much of anything as a return for the expenditures made under this bill. Indeed, I think, the buildings will be a loss. Of course, the corporation holding the contract with the Government may reap some profit from them, but these buildings will be scrapped, so far as the Government is concerned. I do not think any employee will purchase one of the buildings erected by the Shipping Board. Millions will be spent, with dubious benefits. In my opinion no sales of houses will be made and the Government will not be taking mortgages. The Government will erect exceedingly high-priced houses, which it will furnish free to those working in the shipyard. Perhaps that may be necessary, but obviously a fairer and saner plan should have been worked out. This legislation is imperfect and unsafe. It shows that under the stress of war legislation and under the whip and spur of the claim that this is an emergency, we oftentimes pass very unwise, very incomplete, and very foolish legislation.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have examined this conference report with some degree of care, and I am quite surprised that the fair-minded Senator having it in charge contends that important changes have not been made from the text of the bill as it passed either the Senate or the House of Representatives. Important changes have been made, and it could well be ruled out of order if we had a rule such as prevails in the other House and in most legislative bodies, under which we could make a point of order because new matter has been inserted.

If the Senator will turn to the Manual, under the head of "Conference reports," which is a copyrighted article, he will find these words on page 446:

Conferees may not include in their report matters not committed to them by either House.

And if the Senator will turn to the next page, he will read an excerpt from Jefferson's Manual:

Conferees may not strike out in conference anything in a bill agreed to and passed by both Houses.

The Senator will not contend, it seems to me, that the conferees in this case have not added matter. I think he will not contend that they have not stricken out matter; and beyond a question the conferees have exceeded their authority. It has become quite common for conferees to do that; and it is for that reason that the Committee on Rules now has under consideration, in the hands of a subcommittee, of which I am a member, a proposed amendment to the rules that will enable a Senator to make a point of order against new matter or matter that was not in either bill as it went to the conferees; and if that point of order is sustained, the conference report will go back to the committee for further consideration. I feel very sure that an amendment to our rules of that character will be submitted, and I have no doubt it will be agreed to, and in the future we will have an opportunity to stop this growing evil, because it has been exercised to a much greater extent by some other conferees than it has been by the present conferees, in the case of the bill that we are now considering.

I agree very fully with what both the Senators from Utah have said about the looseness of this legislation. A Senator has only to go through some of these newly-established bureaus and inquire as to the salaries that are being paid certain gentlemen there employed to ascertain that it is a scandal that ought to be stopped. I think I know a man who is receiving $6,000 a year in one of these new bureaus who, in my judgment, could not earn $1,500 a year outside of the Government service. I know several instances as striking as that. I will not mention any names. I may, after a while, have occasion to call the attention of the Senate to some of these abuses which, to my mind, are almost criminal. In legislating on all these matters I think we ought to have the legislation so adjusted that the salaries can be in the control of Congress; and we ought not to toss $50,000,000, as we are doing in this bill, into the hands of certain gentlemen to employ whomsoever they please—their relatives, their brothers, their sisters, their cousins, their aunts, or anyone else they choose to employ—and pay them any salary that they see fit to pay them. It is not right.

Mr. RANSDELL and Mr. KING addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. RANSDELL. I was going to ask the Senator—and I agree to the wisdom of almost everything he says, because I nearly always agree with him—whether there are not as many safeguards thrown around this $50,000,000 as there are around the $1,750,000,000 practically turned over to the Shipping Board for the purpose of building ships? Did we safeguard that money in any way different from the way in which we are safeguarding this, and practically could we safeguard it any more thoroughly?

Mr. GALLINGER. Why, Mr. President, that is the very thing I criticize. I think the Senator is right in saying that this is no looser than a great deal of our other legislation.

Mr. RANSDELL. I am referring particularly now to the Shipping Board. We have given them $1,750,000,000 to build ships.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; and we gave the President of the United States one hundred millions, and he has passed I do not know how many millions over to the Creel bureau, where they are employing men at any salary that they choose to pay, where they are putting on their pay roll newspaper correspondents to exploit what they are doing, and it is a grievance; it is to my mind almost criminal failure on our part to allow that sort of thing to go on. I understand that in that bureau—well, I will not say what I understand about it. I have sent to the Committee on Appropriations a resolution calling for the names of the employees, and the salaries paid there; and when we get around to it, I hope the Committee on Appropriations will agree to that resolution, and we will find out precisely what is going on in that regard.

The Senator from Louisiana is right in saying that this is no worse than, and perhaps not as bad as, some other things we have done; but I think the time has come when the Congress of the United States ought to assert its rights as a coordinate branch of the Government, and legislate according to its own judgment, and not because we are told that it is an emergency, that a crisis is confronting the Government, and that we ought to pass any kind of a bill that is sent to us in any form that it may take.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. For the purpose of correcting the evil to which the distinguished Senator has just referred—namely, the large salaries which are being paid by these new bureaus and departments—I will ask the Senator if it would not be proper to pass a measure—and I will state that I have one prepared—providing that in all of these new departments and bureaus that are created the same compensation shall be paid, and no more, than is paid to employees performing like work in the various departments of the Government?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think that would be a very wise provision to incorporate into law.

Mr. KING. I should be very glad to attach it to this measure if it were not a conference report.

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course, however, the Senator can not do that.

Mr. President, I have no disposition to be technical; it is not my habit; but I have been very much annoyed over this practice that has grown up of legislating on conference reports. I have been a member of a good many conference committees, and I have resented it and opposed it in all cases. We ought to get rid of it, and I think we will get rid of it in the near future. As I said before, this is not as flagrant a usurpation as I have sometimes seen of power not granted by the rules of any legislative body that I know anything about, but it is nevertheless a usurpation of power to a limited extent; and while it may not do any harm, I think the practice is so harmful that it ought to be stopped. I can see in this $50,000,000 expenditure—and I have no doubt that it will be three times that much before they get through with it—a great opportunity for something that perhaps may be equally as reprehensible as what the Senator from Louisiana, I believe, with other Senators, has been looking into with reference to a certain shipbuilding plant that was under criticism in this body a few days ago. If we are going into this business by wholesale, I presume I ought not to be the one to find fault with it, because after a while there is going to be a reckoning, after a while there is going to be a day of liquidation, after a while the men who are spending the money of the people of this country to be drawn back into the Treasury by taxation will have to make answer for a great many things that I think now are proper subjects of animadversion and criticism. But, Mr. President, I presume the conference report will be adopted, and what has been said to-day will pass into history as only one more protest against a custom that ought to be stopped, and that, in my judgment, will be stopped in the near future.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

WAR FINANCE CORPORATION.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask that the unfinished business, Senate bill 3714, be laid before the Senate and proceeded with.

The Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3714) to provide further for the national security and defense, and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to provide credits for industries and enterprises in the United States necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Finance with amendments.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the committee amendments be acted upon as they are reached.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HALE. I submit an amendment to the pending bill, which I ask may lie on the table and be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 26 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, February 27, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 26, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Right Rev. Mgr. Mackin offered the following prayer:

In the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost. Amen.

We pray Thee, O God of might, wisdom, and justice, through whom authority is rightly administered, laws are enacted, and judgment decreed, assist with Thy holy spirit of counsel and fortitude the President of these United States that his administration may be conducted in justice and righteousness and be eminently useful to Thy people over whom he presides.

Let the light of Thy divine wisdom direct the deliberations of Congress and shine forth in all the proceedings and laws framed for our rule and government.

We pray especially for the brave men who are guarding our liberties on sea and on shore, that they may be faithful to God and their country, that they may be crowned with glory and honor, and after enjoying the blessings of this life be admitted to those which are eternal.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from New York rise?

Mr. HUSTED. To proffer a unanimous-consent request that leave of absence for one week be granted to my colleague, the Hon. BENJAMIN L. FAIRCHILD, of New York, on account of the death of an only son, who was killed in an aeroplane accident at Fort Worth, Tex., last Saturday afternoon in the service of his country.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent for indefinite leave of absence for his colleague, BENJAMIN L. FAIRCHILD, on account of the death of his son. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the strength, losses, and resources of the warring nations.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to address the House not to exceed two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call attention to the fact that the price of cordwood is rising in the District of Columbia. [Laughter.] The newspapers of recent date all indicate that the price is going up rapidly; that whereas cordwood could be obtained by the people who desired it for their homes in the District for $7 or $8 a cord in normal times, it is now selling around $20, $21, and $22, with a prospect that, converted into kindling wood, it is going up to about $30 to $35 a cord. This is a serious matter. If any check can be put upon it while the Government is issuing orders limiting our food and fuel supply, it may be a good thing to consider it now. One reason for the increase in the price of wood seems to be due to the action of the Government itself, to the action of the Fuel Administration whom we created for the purpose of trying to check and control this very thing. I have in my hand a startling placard issued by the United States Fuel Administration. It is in flaming letters and has been generally posted throughout Maryland. It announces that unless you buy your cordwood now the chances are you will have nothing to burn next winter. That starts the woodman and the ax and the high prices. This is such a remarkable document and has such an influence upon the price of wood at this time that I think it ought to be read for the benefit of those who ought to know. Here is a "question mark" in burning red. Under it we read:

The burning question! Are you providing firewood for next winter in place of coal you will not be able to get?

It is signed "United States Fuel Administration, Ferdinand A. Meyer, Federal fuel administrator for Maryland." Now, we expect to get coal next winter and we are trying to check speculation in food supplies and in fuel, but here is the fuel administrator for the State of Maryland, evidently acting under the auspices of the Federal Fuel Administration, telling everybody to buy wood now that the price of wood is going up and up. The official cry is "Buy! buy! buy!" That is not calculated to help the consumer.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

FEDERAL CONTROL OF RAILROAD TRANSPORTATION.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9685, and pending that I wish to state that I expect to ask the committee to remain in session to-day until the completion of the bill in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the railroad bill.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, did I understand the gentleman to ask unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. No; he did not ask unanimous consent, but made a declaration.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9685, the railroad-control bill, with Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9685, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9685) to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose last evening there was pending an amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. DILLON], which, without objection, will be again reported.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 8, line 5, strike out "$500,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$200,000,000," and, in line 16, after the period, add "$300,000,000 is hereby authorized for expenditures as Congress may hereafter provide to carry into effect the provisions of this act."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes appear to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. DILLON), there were—ayes 12, noes 45.

So the amendment was rejected.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. CARAWAY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message, in writing, was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries.

FEDERAL CONTROL OF RAILROAD TRANSPORTATION.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That for the purpose of providing funds requisite for maturing obligations or for other legal and proper expenditures, or for reorganizing railroads in receivership, carriers may, during the period of Federal control, issue such bonds, notes, equipment trust certificates, stock, and other forms of securities, secured or unsecured by mortgage, as the President may first approve as consistent with the public interest. The President may purchase for the United States all or any part of such securities at prices not exceeding par, and may sell such securities whenever in his judgment it is desirable at prices not less than the cost thereof; any sums available from the revolving fund provided in section 6 may be used for such purchases. The President shall each year as soon as practicable after January 1 cause a detailed report to be submitted to the Congress of all receipts and expenditures made under this section and section 6 during the preceding calendar year.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LENROOT: Page 10, line 4, after the word "may," insert the following: "within the limit of appropriations made therefor by Congress."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. SIMS. May I ask the gentleman if that is simply confined to appropriations?

Mr. LENROOT. This requires appropriation by Congress for the purchase of these securities.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this is a very different question from that discussed last night. In the first place, this section has no proper place in this bill at all, in view of the fact that there is a bill now pending before the Ways and Means Committee, the purpose and design of which is to take care of situations where, in order to float liberty bonds, securities of all character of corporations are to be taken care of so far as necessary. And I have been informed by different members of the Ways and Means Committee that that is one of the things that the Ways and Means Committee is now discussing in connection with that bill. They will have $500,000,000 of an appropriation if the bill passes and authority to loan $4,000,000,000 in addition. The question will be decided, not by the President but by a corporation to be created that will pass upon these issues. So that from any standpoint this proposition of purchasing securities has no place in this bill. But if it is to be included, why they ought to be compelled to come to Congress with their estimates for appropriations for the purchase of securities of carriers.

Now, there is no man who will say that the purchase of these securities is necessary to operate the railroads. No man will say that the purchase of these securities is necessary to prosecute the war, except as it may affect general credit. When you talk about $200,000,000 of short-term notes, to become due within the next year, what we are paying this $950,000,000 a year for that will be paid to these railroads by way of compensation? I say that in this time of war, if these railroads owe short-time notes, the stockholders of those railroads, instead of saddling those short-time notes upon the Government, ought to forego their dividends in order to meet their notes for the time being. And Congress ought not to give authority to anybody to purchase securities of railroads at will and unlimited in amount, because there is no limitation in this section. The President, if he sees fit, can obligate this Government for the purchase of every security that is issued by a railroad during this Federal control, and the section provides that the section may authorize such securities to be issued as he sees fit.

Now, what business has that in this bill? Why is it necessary to have any question of securities in the operation of railroads by the Federal Government? That is a question of the credit of the railroads. That has nothing to do with the question of operation. It can not in the slightest degree affect the successful or unsuccessful operation of railroads by the Government, whether the securities are issued or not issued by the railroads, whether they are sold or unsold by the railroads. It affects only the matter of credit as affecting the country in the floating of liberty bonds.

Mr. SNOOK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. SNOOK. Is the purport of this amendment the gentleman offers this, that it makes it necessary if they wanted to float any securities or aid in the floating of them to go to the Committee on Appropriations to get an appropriation?

Mr. LENROOT. Not at all. If this amendment is adopted, before the President can purchase any securities of railroads an estimate must be made to the Committee on Appropriations and an appropriation made for that purpose.

Mr. SNOOK. That is what I say. That is the effect of your amendment?

Mr. LENROOT. That is exactly the effect of it.

Mr. SNOOK. It does not give the Director General authority to expend this $500,000 without going to the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. LENROOT. This only affects securities—the purchase of securities.

Mr. SNOOK. For equipment; but he could not expend anything for securities?

Mr. LENROOT. Not in the purchase of securities. There is no member of the committee will say that the purchase of securities has anything whatever to do with the operation of the roads.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Under the $500,000,000 clause the President is allowed to buy equipment for the railroads. The amount is to be repaid by the railroads, as stated on page 9, on such terms as he may order. Those terms ought to be with security for its repayment, and one of the most practical ways of getting that payment back would be for the President to authorize the railroads to issue securities for the repayment of those advances that he has made. It is a maturing obligation.

Mr. LENROOT. I can not yield further.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. That is all I wanted to say. Is not that so?

Mr. LENROOT. No; it is not so; absolutely. The previous section authorizes advances to railroads, and, of course, the President may take any security for such advances as he may require. That is not purchasing securities of railroads. This section has nothing whatever to do with advances made by the President on securities that he may take to protect such advances. It has only to do with the approval of the President of securities issued by railroads and the authority of the President to purchase securities when used. I want to say this, and this House ought to most seriously bear it in mind, that when we come to float the next liberty loan and the liberty loan following that one we will go to the laboring men of this country and say to them that we ask them to make sacrifices to buy a $50 liberty bond because we need it to prosecute the war.

Yet, if this section remains in the bill as it now stands anyone will be able to truthfully point to this section and say: "The purpose of taking your hard-earned money is not to prosecute the war primarily, but it is to purchase the securities of railroads, when we are paying nearly a billion dollars a year for compensation." Can you justify it upon that side of the aisle? We have done all that we ought to do, unless it should be in your general scheme of credit, such as the Committee on Ways and Means now has in course of preparation. We have done all that we ought to do in giving the railroads compensation. In addition we are making an avenue whereby they can use this compensation to pay dividends to themselves in the case of one railroad, more than 20 per cent, and then say: "We are going to ask you to pay our indebtedness on these short-time notes." Can you justify that? I am sure you can not, and if this goes through eventually, if this section shall be finally written in the law as it now is, and the liberty loans shall fail in the future, the sponsors of this bill will have to take part of the responsibility for that failure.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the statement that is made, that the surplus of the railroads at the time they were taken over was $288,000,000 in cash, and that they held in nonaffiliated corporations stock of other companies up to the value of over $800,000,000, and any portion, under the terms of this bill, of that stock now held as surplus of nonaffiliated companies might be sold or purchased by the Government of the United States under the terms of this act.

Mr. FORDNEY rose.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Michigan has risen. I do not know whether he rose in opposition to the amendment or not.

Mr. FORDNEY. I wanted to speak in favor of the amendment.

Mr. SIMS. I am in opposition to it.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] has offered his amendment and states what its purpose is, and the reason why he offers it is that the President can not purchase any notes, bonds, or securities of railroads issued by the railroad after the railroad is in Government control without a special authorization or special appropriation by the Committee on Appropriations of Congress for that purpose.

Now, the appropriation here is indirectly made. After providing that "the President may purchase for the United States all or any part of such securities at prices not exceeding par, and may sell such securities whenever, in his judgment, it is desirable, at prices not less than the cost thereof; any sums available from the revolving fund provided in section 6 may be used for such purchases."

Now, the purchase of these securities is limited by this provision to such portions of the revolving fund as may not have been used for other purposes. Now, the object of this provision is very evident and plain when we look at what is intended. Take a railroad like the Pennsylvania, abundantly solvent; any of its securities would meet with ready sale in a normal market; and there is needed some improvement to be made on the Pennsylvania road while in Federal control. The railroad is able to do so, and willing to do so, but if it issues its notes they may be issued at 5 per cent or 6 per cent or 7 per cent and put upon the market, absolutely solvent, absolutely good, and compete immediately with the Government in trying to sell the liberty loan bonds at 4 per cent or 4½ per cent, or whatever it may be. Now, inasmuch as the Government will take absolutely no risk; inasmuch as this revolving fund may be used, or such portion of it as has not otherwise been used to purchase these securities, to keep them off of the market not in excess of par, and he may afterwards at any time resell them at a price not less than what the Government paid for them. It is a fiscal operation not absolutely necessary to enable the solvent railroad company to obtain money with which to make necessary needed improvements, but it is done in order that the railroad may make its own improvements with its own means and at the same time not compete with its higher interest-bearing securities with the Government in the sale of its own bonds.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. The railroad will not make any improvements out of its own means if we purchase securities to give them the money.

Mr. SIMS. That is out of its own means.

Mr. LENROOT. I mean we furnish the money in that case.

Mr. SIMS. The President has the right to approve or disapprove of the issue.

Mr. LENROOT. I am coming to another question. So far as furnishing the money to make the improvement is concerned, that is wholly covered by the preceding section. He may advance the money for that purpose if they can not do it themselves. He can take any security he sees fit. This has nothing to do with that.

Mr. SIMS. This provision in the bill is to provide for the railway that is willing to use its own funds for the improvements in such a way that the Government may furnish the money so that that railroad thereby can dispose of its securities at the lowest rate of interest—lower than it otherwise could, with virtually a guaranty upon it if the Government does it, and then the Government may at times, when it is not in the money market itself with bonds, sell these securities without loss. And now the gentleman has gotten up here—and while I might say it about others, I would not say it about him, because I do not believe it is true of him—and makes what would be characterized as a demagogic appeal that when we go out and try to sell bonds and ask the boys to buy $50 bonds to help the Government will stand an act of the President in buying railway securities, and therefore if he can buy railway securities and has money to invest in railway securities, why should he ask the boy or a person in needy circumstances, but patriotic, to invest $50 in liberty loans for the purpose of using it for such a purpose as that?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMS. Now, the gentleman has put an argument in the mouth of every man who may be appealed to to purchase a Government security or bond in order to prosecute the war, that if you can find anywhere where the President has spent money for something that the man himself may contend was not a strictly war purpose it may be to him an excuse for not subscribing for the bonds.

This is a very proper provision, and as I said last night on the other matter we can not operate these railroads without some liberality, without trusting the President for something; and to undertake to make specific provision to require a previous appropriation by Congress before the President is permitted to do that which is absolutely safe to be done, and indirectly prove a public benefit, is going to limit and cripple largely the railway operations while in Government control.

I hope no man on the floor of the House is so opposed to the Government succeeding in anything it does touching privately owned property, for fear that it may be used as an argument in favor of continued Government control, or an argument in favor of Government ownership, that he will seek to impose such rigid, ironclad conditions, and limitations as will make Government operation a failure.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. FESS. In lines 7, 8, and 9, page 10, where it is provided that "any sums available from the revolving fund provided in section 6 may be used for such purposes" is the President limited to the revolving fund, or may he go beyond that to make these purchases?

Mr. SIMS. My understanding is that this is practically a limitation upon the amount of such securities that he may purchase.

Mr. FESS. If that were true, that would be very suggestive.

Mr. SIMS. That is what it amounts to.

Mr. FESS. If it goes beyond that, I think the amendment is very important.

Mr. SIMS. That is my understanding of it, and I do not think there is any question about it.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SNELL. Do I understand that the securities issued under section 7 are guaranteed by the Government?

Mr. SIMS. No. The Government authorizes their issue. In other words, the railroad company can not issue without Government permission.

Mr. SNELL. Will there not always be securities on the market at a higher rate of interest than the Government bonds are selling, with which they must compete?

Mr. SIMS. There may be, but there will not be securities issued by the railroads after they have been taken over by the Government. This is an effort to prevent the issue of railway securities while under Government control to compete with Government securities; but at the same time, if the road is a good, solvent one, and the owners of the road are willing to spend their own money, this is to permit the sale of its securities under such circumstances as will not operate against the Government in seeking the sale of its securities.

Mr. SNELL. I do not understand why these railroad securities would be any better if issued when the Government has control of them than they are at this time, if the roads themselves are good.

Mr. SIMS. I will tell you why they will be better with this permission in here permitting the Government to buy them.

Mr. SNELL. Without that provision?

Mr. SIMS. With this provision permitting the Government to buy them, they will float at a less rate of interest. There is no doubt about it.

Mr. SNELL. If you permitted the Government to buy any other securities, the same thing would be true of them.

Mr. SIMS. The Government is not responsible for any securities issued heretofore, and would have to go into a long investigation to ascertain their solvency, and it would be an indirect guaranty of their securities.

Mr. SNELL. Then this is an indirect guaranty of these securities?

Mr. SIMS. This is an indirect guaranty of the securities issued by permission of the President while the railroads are in Government control.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman think that the authority granted to the President to purchase for the United States all or any part of such securities as are previously authorized in this section would grant the President power to create a deficiency in the purchase of bonds? In other words, could he go beyond the limit of the surplus of the revolving fund?

Mr. SIMS. If the President did purchase beyond the limit of the fund I do not think the purchase itself would be void; but I do not think the President under any circumstances would go beyond what seems to be a clear limitation, but not a rigid one, in this provision I have just read.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. SIMS. I have used 10 minutes. I do not ask any more time.

Mr. MADDEN. I move to strike out the last word. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee in charge of the bill to what I believe would be a dangerous condition under the provisions of the section now under discussion. I was in some doubt myself at first as to whether the President would have the right to go beyond the surplus in the revolving fund in his purchases of securities; but after consultation with other gentlemen and a thorough reading of the section itself, I have made up my mind that the President would not be confined to the surplus in the revolving fund in his purchase of certificates or securities, and that if he chose he could purchase securities largely in excess of the surplus in the revolving fund, and in that way create a deficiency. Now, if that be the case, it seems to me that wisdom dictates the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin, because it would ratify the right of the President to go beyond the surplus in the revolving fund in purchasing securities; but in order to do that he would be compelled to go to the Appropriations Committee and indicate what amount of securities he intended to purchase and obtain authority from the Appropriations Committee, and the House, for the purchase of the certificates which he proposes to buy.

Mr. SIMS. Now, I want to ask the gentleman, as a practical business man, what he thinks about this proposition: Suppose that Congress is not in session and the Pennsylvania Railroad—I use it as an illustration, because it is a good road—wants to make certain improvements. The President knows that the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. is solvent and good, and he authorizes the improvements—that is, authorizes the sale of the bonds for the purpose of making that improvement—when Congress is not in session. Now, he could not purchase those at all, and the railroad company could not make the improvement until Congress has first authorized it and made an appropriation for it.

Mr. MADDEN. I think he could confine himself, and ought properly to confine himself, to the limit of the surplus in the revolving fund.

Mr. SIMS. That is exactly what is done.

Mr. MADDEN. Unless he gets additional authority from the Congress, after making a statement of the importance of the transaction which he proposes to execute.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Would not this accomplish exactly what the gentleman and what the gentleman from Illinois contemplate: In line 7, strike out the word "any" and insert in its place the word "only"?

Mr. MADDEN. I think likely it would.

Mr. DEMPSEY. That does not increase at all the liability which is created; it simply makes the revolving fund available for this purpose and does not permit going a cent beyond it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The same purpose could be attained by striking out the word "may" and inserting the word "shall."

Mr. MADDEN. I think both suggestions would cover the case, and I think it is our duty to surround legislation of this kind with all the safeguards possible; not that we have any doubt that the President will do what is right, not that he will not do it in a right way, but we ought not to authorize anybody in times of stress like this to create a financial obligation against the Government without restrictions.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. I want to call attention to the fact that if this modification of the gentleman from New York should be made the President might use every dollar in the revolving fund for that purpose and then come to Congress for a deficiency appropriation.

Mr. MADDEN. And instead of improving it it would injure it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Under section 1 and section 6, the revolving fund is created for the purposes of this act, and the President can not expend a dollar beyond that for any purpose without coming to Congress and having it increased, except it may be increased by the surplus that goes into it.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, let us look concretely, if possible, at the question now before us, because I believe it is one of very great moment. This bill provides, in the first place, that there shall be an agreement, if possible, between the President of the United States and the railroad corporations for the use, compensation, and control of these railway systems. Now, the word control, from its legal definition, contemplates the management and the administration of railroad affairs. If it contemplates the administration of railroad affairs and the management of railroad affairs, then, it follows as a natural sequence, that the President of the United States, through the Director General, must have control and administration of the financial affairs of the railway corporation.

The Government being in control and possession of the railway systems must in some way take care of these maturing obligations. The railway officials themselves can not take care of them. They have no power to take care of them while these railways are under Federal control.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. DEWALT. I will.

Mr. LENROOT. Why not, what are we paying them compensation for?

Mr. DEWALT. We are paying them compensation of $945,000,000 for operating expenses, operating the railroads, for betterments and improvements, and for the use and occupation of the roads.

Mr. LENROOT. Is it not a fact that their securities are higher to-day, that their stock and securities have risen on the stock exchange since we took Federal control?

Mr. DEWALT. I am very glad to say that that is so.

Mr. LENROOT. Therefore, are they not in better shape to-day to take care of their securities than they were before the Government took them over?

Mr. DEWALT. That does not meet the question, whether they are better off to-day than they were day before yesterday. The paramount question is, Have they the power and authority to take care of them? I concede that the gentleman is entirely fair in his argument, and I can see, too, that his motives are patriotic and right from his point of view, but when you grant to the Director General certain powers in this bill, and under the powers granted in the act of 1916 the exclusive control and management and administration of these railway companies, you take from them in that very instant the management of their financial affairs. There can be no question about that. If that be true, the maturing obligations must be taken care of, the management and administration of affairs of the companies must be taken care of, by the party that has control over them, and that is the Director General.

We will say that railroad A has a million dollars of maturing obligations. If they endeavor to float a new loan, the bankers would at once say we will not float your new obligations to take up maturing obligations. Why not? Because you have no longer authority over them, because they are under Federal control. What is the Federal control? The Director General. Therefore it becomes necessary for the President to issue new bonds and new notes to take care of maturing obligations.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. As I understand, there is no disagreement about the policy that the President should be bestowed with this power, but was it the intention of the committee to give him the power to spend money for that purpose in excess of the $500,000,000?

Mr. DEWALT. No; and there I must disagree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. He takes the position that the money could be expended in excess of the revolving fund. I can not so interpret this act.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DEWALT. Let me read the provision—and I refer my remarks to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]:

> The President may purchase for the United States all or any part of such securities at prices not exceeding par, and may sell such securities whenever in his judgment it is desirable at prices not less than the cost thereof; any sums available from the revolving fund provided in section 6 may be used for such purchases. The President shall each year, as soon as practicable after January 1, cause a detailed report to be submitted to the Congress of all receipts and expenditures made under this section and section 6 during the preceding calendar year.

Now, what moneys does the President get into his hands under the provisions of this bill? There are two sorts of moneys obtained: First, he obtains the money from the operating income, to wit, receipts of the railroad companies from freight and passenger traffic. Secondly, he receives an appropriation of $500,000,000 as a revolving fund. From this revolving fund of $500,000,000 and from the income from operation of freight and passenger traffic he is allowed to do what? To operate the roads and pay the expenses of the operation, make betterments and improvements, and to order betterments and improvements to be made, and to pay for them out of the revolving fund, if he so chooses, and charge them up against the standard return fixed by the terms of the bill. Third, he is authorized by this to take from the revolving fund, not from the operating income, money enough to pay for these maturing obligations or to renew maturing obligations.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. In just one moment. What is the result of this? The United States Government by reason of its great financial stability is able to issue bonds at 4 per cent—issued them at 3½ per cent prior to this last issue. It borrows money at 4 per cent. Suppose the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. owed a million dollars' worth of maturing obligations. I take the position, and I think it is sound in law and sound in reasoning, that after the Federal control the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. could not, without the affirmative consent of the President, issue anything to take the place of those maturing obligations, and that the power rests in the President of the United States, because he has control. But suppose, now, they wanted to issue new obligations, and suppose they had obtained the consent of the President so to do, and those obligations bore 5 and 6 per cent, the Government stands back of those obligations; but it can borrow money at 4 per cent, and when it issues these bonds for the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. it is actually making 2 per cent on the bargain.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. Is it not the purpose to put the next liberty-loan issue at 4½ per cent?

Mr. DEWALT. I do not know.

Mr. MEEKER. I do.

Mr. DEWALT. The gentleman's information upon that subject is more definite than mine.

Mr. MEEKER. I got it directly that the Government will not be borrowing money at 4 per cent.

Mr DEWALT. It would not change the situation.

Mr. MEEKER. It does as to the rate of percentage, to the credit of the Government.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Suppose the language read, "The President may purchase for the United States all or any part of such securities at prices not exceeding par," and stopped there, what would be the authority of the President?

Mr. DEWALT. He could not buy anything out of the revolving fund.

Mr. LENROOT. No; but what contracts could he make?

Mr. DEWALT. I do not catch the drift of the gentleman's question.

Mr. LENROOT. What contract could he make obligating the Government—to what extent could he obligate the Government?

Mr. DEWALT. Then he could go beyond the revolving fund.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; I agree with the gentleman. Then the provision with reference to the revolving fund does not mean anything more than that he may use the money in the revolving fund to pay that obligation instead of coming to Congress and getting an appropriation.

Mr. DEWALT. Yes; it does mean just that very thing, and that is exactly what I think he ought to have the power to do.

Mr. LENROOT. Does it mean anything more than that?

Mr. DEWALT. No; I do not think it does.

Mr. LENROOT. Then the gentleman must concede that the authority of the President to obligate the Government is unlimited under the bill.

Mr. DEWALT. That does not follow in my thought at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired. Without objection, the pro forma amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois is withdrawn.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to the amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read. The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. FORDNEY offers the following amendment to the amendment offered by Mr. LENROOT: Page 10, lines 4 to 9, inclusive, after the word "interest" in line 4, strike out the remainder of the line and all of lines 5, 6, 7, 8, and line 9, through and including the word "purchases."

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment for this reason: There is now pending before the Committee on Ways and Means a bill, presented and prepared by the administration, the purpose of which is to create a corporation called the war-finance corporation, with a capital of $500,000,000, with authority vested in that corporation, if the bill is enacted into law as presented, to issue to the extent of eight times the amount of its capital in loans to railroads and other industries of the country that may be engaged in producing something used in carrying on this war. That is to say, the bill has not been perfected by the Committee on Ways and Means. We are working every day on the bill.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. If I understand the gentleman's amendment, it is really a substitute for the Lenroot amendment?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; my amendment is to strike out.

Mr. SIMS. And Mr. LENROOT's amendment is an amendment to the provision?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. Then the gentleman's amendment becomes a substitute, so far as it goes.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I propose will have preference over the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. SIMS. I mean in voting.

Mr. LENROOT. My amendment would come first.

Mr. SIMS. Then the gentleman's amendment is to strike out, and is therefore virtually a substitute?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes. If this bill is permitted to be enacted into law as the language is in the bill now, this is what you are going to do: Under the provisions of the bill now before the Committee on Ways and Means this war-finance corporation will be permitted under the law to loan through local banks to railroad companies and other institutions producing something in aid in carrying on the war 75 per cent of the market value of the securities offered, and only 75 per cent. In addition to this loan directly to the railroad companies and other institutions, this paper must be indorsed by the local banks where the loan is made and then rediscounted with this war-finance corporation at not to exceed 75 per cent of the amount loaned by the local bank.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. Does the legislation the gentleman has in mind confine the authorization to securities issued by railroads since they have been taken over, or does it apply to any securities?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; it does not confine them to any length of time or the time of issue, but it is proposed to loan money to the railroad companies because the railroad companies of the country to-day can not borrow money through the ordinary channels of private banks and trust companies, and it is found necessary by the administration to create this corporation with a capital of $500,000,000 to make total loans of $4,000,000,000, if found necessary, on a basis of 75 per cent of the amount loaned by the local banks, as before stated, when indorsed by the local bank and presented to this war finance corporation. If you enact this provision into law, you are going to have two bodies with the power solely in the Government, one in the President of the United States and the other in this war finance corporation, both loaning money on railroad securities, one bidding against the other, the President authorized to loan 100 per cent of the value of securities offered and this war finance corporation permitted to loan only 75 per cent of their total value when indorsed also by the local bank, as I have stated.

This bill authorizes the President to make loans such as he may choose and take such securities as he may think proper without any restraint by any other power in the Government. I say, gentlemen, that we are creating by the enactment in this bill into law, and the one now before the Ways and Means Committee to purchase bonds and other securities and loan money to the railroads, one in competition, as I said, with the other, and not only $4,000,000,000 but a total in both bodies of $4,500,000,000; and the President will come back, in the course of a very short time, and ask for several hundred million dollars more, because if this bill is enacted into law we might as well throw the other in the wastebasket, so far as loans to railroads are concerned, because no railroad company will ask for a 75 per cent loan upon its securities when they can go to the President of the United States and get 100 per cent of their market value, especially if that company has a political pull. Therefore to me, gentlemen, it would be a great mistake to enact this bill into law with this language in the bill, and I therefore offer the amendment, and I sincerely hope it will carry.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan is a motion to strike out, and amendments to perfect will take precedence over that motion. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD to the Lenroot amendment: Insert before the pending amendment the following amendment: After the words "to the extent of $200,000,000 and" insert the word "further" before the word "limit," so as to read "to the extent of $200,000,000 and within the further limit of appropriations hereafter made therefor by Congress."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, there is a difference of opinion among members of the committee as to whether there is any limitation whatsoever on the authority of the President to obligate the Government in the purchase of these securities. There is no question of the authorization language whereby the President could obligate the Government in the purchase of these securities to the extent of billions of dollars. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] says that the only limitation to the authorization is the amount of the revolving fund. That may amount to a billion dollars, certainly $500,000,000 here provided and whatever additional receipts that result from the revenues of the railroads in their operation.

Mr. DEWALT. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will.

Mr. DEWALT. Does the gentleman have any definite or indefinite idea of the amount of these maturing obligations now existing that will mature in the next two years?

Mr. STAFFORD. I have no definite idea as to the amount, but my amendment provides for an authorization of the President to obligate the Government out of this revolving fund to the extent of $200,000,000. It places that limit on the authorization and then authorizes him, if need be, to come to Congress for a further authorization. Two hundred million dollars, I take it, would be ample under the conditions to meet any pressing exigency whereby the Government would be compelled by reason of financial conditions in floating these bonds for the time being.

Mr. DEWALT. If the gentleman will permit, the reason I asked that question was this: The gentleman stated that the President might purchase a billion dollars' worth of these outstanding obligations and securities. The statistics show that there will be about $360,000,000 of these maturing obligations within the next two years.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then my amendment, which authorizes the President to obligate the Government to the extent of $200,000,000, safeguards the interests not only of the Government as such, but safeguards the interests of the Government in the operation of the railroads. It does not restrict them in any way, but it places a check upon the action of the Director General in obligating the Government to an unlimited extent. I do not think this Congress is willing to grant unlimited authority to the Director General to obligate the Government to the extent of hundreds of millions of dollars. This amendment authorizes him as soon as it is enacted into law to obligate the Government to the extent of $200,000,000 and let the Director General then come before the Congress, before the appropriate committees, if there is need for further authorization, and get an additional authorization. We should, under the circumstances, place some control over the action of the Director General in this great power we are vesting in him. There is no limitation here. There is an authorization whereby the Director General can go to any extent, not even limited by the amount of the revolving fund. I say Congress should properly limit the authorization, and the amendment I propose places that limit at $200,000,000. If there is need for more authorization, why, then, let him come to Congress. The bill that is now being considered by the Ways and Means Committee, which bill was not considered at the time this bill was presented to the Congress, will give full authority beyond the $200,000,000. Some limit should be placed upon the power given the President as to the extent to which he may be authorized to purchase the securities of the railroads.

Mr. BARKLEY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to be recognized in opposition?

Mr. BARKLEY. I desire to offer an amendment, if it is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment to the amendment?

Mr. BARKLEY. As a substitute for all amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky, a member of the committee.

Mr. BARKLEY. I move to insert after the word "may," in line 4, the following words: "out of the revolving fund created by this act." Then strike out the words "any sums," in lines 7 and 9, down to and including the word "purchases," so that the section would read: "The President may, out of the revolving fund created by this act, purchase for the United States all or any part of such securities," and so forth.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10, line 4, after the word "may," insert the words "out of the revolving fund created by this act," and, in line 7, after the word "thereof," strike out "any sums available from the revolving fund provided in section 6 may be used for such purchases."

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, that simply makes it clear that the President is to purchase these obligations out of the revolving fund, and that he can not go beyond that in obligating the Government for this particular purpose. It seems to me that accomplishes the purpose desired by the gentleman from Wisconsin and meets the suggestion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY], and I think the adoption of this amendment will clear up any misapprehension about authorizing the President to go beyond the fund.

Mr. FESS. Is it the desire of the gentleman to limit the revolving fund or to extend it to the running expenses or the proceeds that come from the running of the road?

Mr. BARKLEY. This goes into the revolving fund. So the bill makes a revolving fund of the $500,000,000 appropriated and any surplus that may go into it out of operating the railroad.

Mr. FESS. So it would not limit it to the $500,000,000?

Mr. BARKLEY. No; all the revolving fund, or more, if the companies put it into the Treasury.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment by way of substitute offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I must confess that I am not sure that I understand the effect of any of these amendments, and I am in good faith seeking some information. I understand from the gentleman who has offered the amendment that the $500,000,000 fund that is appropriated is reinforced by earnings that may come. Am I correct in that?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. So there may be a billion dollars in the revolving fund?

Mr. BARKLEY. If the gentleman will refer to section 6, he will find there—

That the sum of $500,000,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, which, together with any funds available from any operating income of said carrier—

And so forth. Those two make the revolving fund.

Mr. CANNON. Now, that sets my mind at rest there. It was unsettled by some statements that had been made during the debate upon these amendments as to the revolving fund.

Now, as I understand it, the object of this is twofold. I will first ask another question. Take roads in receivership and take roads not in receivership, then can they issue bonds without legislation while the Director General controls the roads and put them upon the market?

Mr. BARKLEY. They can, with the prior approval of the President.

Mr. CANNON. I know, but without regard to the approval of the President, suppose the railway company desires to reorganize, can that road, if it be in the hands of a receiver, be put up for sale and sold, and then, under the decree, can bonds be issued without regard to the Director General or the President?

Mr. BARKLEY. The court might direct, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois—a court in which the receivership is pending would have the power to authorize the issue of bonds for the reorganization of a road.

Mr. CANNON. At any interest the court might fix that is legal?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Is there any question about that? Is that disputed by anybody? I would like to be satisfied now upon that point. What does the gentleman in charge of the bill say?

Mr. SIMS. This bill does not undertake to interfere with the action of the court in receivership cases so far as the merits of the receivership and legal questions involved are concerned. But if the Government takes over a railroad in receivership it pays for the use of it such just compensation as place and circumstances may entitle the railroad to.

Mr. CANNON. So that in section 7, for the purpose of providing funds, and so forth, or for improvements of railroads in receivership, and so forth, this revolving fund may be used?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes. For instance, if there was a reorganization of a road in receivership and an issue of bonds were authorized, but by any reason or any circumstances, either that the Government was at that time seeking to monopolize the money market for its own bonds, or that reorganized railroad could find no market to purchase its bonds, the Government would come to the rescue and purchase those bonds so that it could proceed without embarrassment.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I will.

Mr. HARDY. Before the gentleman from Kentucky has prepared his amendment, which was intended to meet the objection of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], which was to the effect that the first sentence or phrase of this paragraph authorized an unlimited contract by the President for the purchasing of bonds, I had prepared this amendment, which I thought would cure the defect, if it was a defect:

The President may, out of any sums available from the revolving fund provided in section 6, purchase for the United States all or any part of such securities at prices not exceeding par, and may sell such securities—

And so forth. The question I wanted to ask the gentleman was if that was the equivalent?

Mr. BARKLEY. That is exactly the equivalent, except I do not say out of any fund. I say out of the fund created by this act.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. I think I understand. Let me put a case. There are some railroads that have receivers, and some very good ones. As I understand it, a decree might be entered and the road sold, of course, independent of the President or the Director General. Suppose they would authorize in the decree that from the proceeds of the sale certain obligations should be paid and would authorize the issue of bonds at 6 per cent. I take it the decree would have to be sufficient so it could be successfully carried on. Now, those bonds drawing 6 per cent, if the Government was floating liberty bonds at 4 or 4½ or 5 per cent, presumably would be taken over by the Director General at par and sold at par, within his discretion. Am I correct in that?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes. He can buy them at par, but can not sell them at less than par.

Mr. BARKLEY. He can buy them at less than par.

Mr. CANNON. At less than par, and probably if they would run at 4½ per cent he would buy them at less than par. Now, that protects the Government in its financial transactions when it puts Government bonds upon the market, and that same thing is true, as I understand it, if there had to be an indebtedness incurred by a railroad for maintenance or for the payment of maturing obligations—notes, and so forth.

If that is true and your amendment is adopted, I want to ask what is the objection to the legislation that is proposed?

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, may I just say a word to the gentleman?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. I suppose the gentleman from Illinois will admit that a great many of these outstanding obligations of the railroad companies are now held by banks and by private individuals as well.

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. Now, conceding for the moment that the Government does not back up and uphold these maturing obligations, would they fall upon the market and depreciate very much?

Mr. CANNON. I have no doubt about it.

Mr. DEWALT. That would create instability, would it not, as to all these securities?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. If the Government had the right to back all these securities outstanding, would not that stabilize the market?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; it would seem to me to accomplish a double object: First, stabilize the market for the bonds issued by the road and not embarrass the Government when its bonds are placed on the market.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, I intended, as I indicated, to offer an amendment substituting, in line 7, the word "only" for the word "any," which would have had the effect of limiting the amount that the President can use to the fund of $500,000,000 created by this bill. But the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] accomplishes the same result and in perhaps a more logical and better literary way, so that I will not offer my amendment.

Now, we come to the consideration of what the situation is. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] has offered an amendment, and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] has also offered an amendment to accomplish the same purpose. The gentleman from Wisconsin proposes to limit the sum which may be used here to express appropriations by Congress. Then the other gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] limits that to $200,000,000.

Mr. LENROOT. No; he appropriates $200,000,000 outright.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes; he appropriates $200,000,000 outright. Then the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] offers an amendment by which he strikes out the entire sentence.

Now, as between these various amendments, I am for the Barkley amendment. I believe that the President should have the right to use this revolving fund for this purpose, and the only objection I have heard urged to it is this, that the President might utilize the entire $500,000,000 for that purpose. That is a very violent and wholly unwarranted supposition, with nothing on which to base it. We have to assume that the President would utilize that fund for all the purposes for which he is given the right to use it and in the best way that he can see to use it from time to time as he needs it, so that I think we need give ourselves no uneasiness upon that score.

Then we come to the other amendments. I am against them, because I believe the President should be given a broad scope and the right to utilize this sum; but as between the two amendments, that of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] and that of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], I am frankly for the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan, for this reason: I think the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin is open to this criticism, in addition to others: I think it is in conflict with itself. I think the latter part of the sentence is in conflict with the first part. It says in the first part of the sentence, "He may use only such sums as are appropriated by Congress," and in the second part he says, "He may utilize the revolving fund." What does the sentence mean as a whole? Any court would have to construe it, and the meaning would be very doubtful indeed.

But of course that is a technical constructional objection. It does not go to the broad merits of the question. It comes, then, to the objection of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], that the Committee on Ways and Means is considering a means of relief. Well, it is entirely proper for the Committee on Ways and Means to provide a means of relief, but that should not be in conflict at all with the right of the President to utilize this revolving fund in this way as well as in other ways. But if you are going to cut out that measure of relief, if you are not going to allow the President to utilize this revolving fund, then strike out the sentence and make the meaning clear and indisputable.

But I say, on the other hand, let us take a broad view of this situation. So long as we are giving the President this revolving fund we are not adding to our liabilities a single cent. The fund has been created. Why not give the President a broad power to use it for this purpose as well as for other purposes? What objection could there be? There might come a time when it would be more important to utilize some part of this fund for this purpose than for any other purpose, to stabilize values, to make the market firm and stable, to prevent disaster. I say so long as we do not increase the liability, so long as the amount is limited, so long as the fund is created, let us make it possible for the President to utilize this amount for every beneficial purpose, and this may prove to be the most beneficial of all. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto do now close.

Mr. MONDELL. Does that include the Fordney amendment?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Does that include the motion to strike out, made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY]?

Mr. SIMS. No. I understand that to be a substitute. This applies to the Lenroot amendment and all amendments thereto.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I wanted to inquire of the Chair, parliamentarily, whether or not the Fordney amendment is not a separate amendment by itself, to strike out?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. SIMS. Is the Barkley amendment a separate amendment?

Mr. MADDEN. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the parliamentary situation. There are three propositions pending; you might say four: The amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] and an amendment to that amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD]; then the motion to strike out, made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY]. That is considered as pending, but merely pending. Then a substitute was offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY]. Now, when we reach the voting stage, the vote will first be taken upon the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD]. After that has been voted upon, then the vote will come on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY]. When that proposition is finally settled and the Lenroot and Barkley amendments are disposed of, as the committee may determine, then the motion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] to strike out is in order. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] asks unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment and amendments thereto, not including the Fordney amendment, do now close.

Mr. FESS. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. SIMS. What does the gentleman wish to debate?

Mr. FESS. The Barkley amendment.

Mr. SIMS. Therefore, I will ask, Mr. Chairman, that all debate on the amendments, with the exception of the Fordney amendment, close in five minutes, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] to have the five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that debate on all pending amendments, except the Fordney proposition, to strike out, be concluded in five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, there was some confusion in my mind as to how much was comprehended in the term "revolving fund." The confusion was very largely suggested by the discriminating discussion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] when he spoke of the two sources, and did not include at the time the proceeds in the form of profit for the operation of the railroads as a part of the revolving fund. If those are in the revolving fund, then there can be no doubt in my mind of the wisdom of the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky. It gets precisely what I think this side of the House over here would like to have.

I will say frankly to the members of the committee that I would not vote for an amendment that would in any way cripple the President in stabilizing these securities, for the purpose of this is not only to take care of these maturing obligations, as was suggested a moment ago by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT]. It is much broader than that. In addition to maturing obligations we say—

Or for other legal and proper expenditures.

That is a blanket authorization. There is no limitation there—

Or for reorganizing railroads in receiverships.

So it can not be simply to take care of the maturing obligations. There may be a much larger fund than would be stipulated for that purpose.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I will yield.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If I understood correctly the motion of the gentleman from Michigan, it would not apply to the last part.

Mr. FESS. I am speaking now of the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], which I think comprehends language that I would like to vote for. I would like, however, to say to the members of the committee that we are now in a stage of legislation here that I think is exceedingly important to note, and that is to hold up the price by Government action of an article that is going to be in the market, and in order to do it we are supplying the purchaser, and that purchaser is the Government, and the Government is limited in the amount it is to pay, and it is also limited in the minimum that it is to receive. Now, here is the delicacy of that situation: In order to stabilize these securities you must find a buyer, and in case you can not find a buyer in the open market, Uncle Sam comes in and takes it, and he must not take it at a price above par. We assume by that that he will take it at par, if the purpose is to stabilize, and we have got a certain purchaser. Now, with the securities in our hands to be paid for, not above a certain price, suppose that we can not get the amount that we paid for them. We can not by this act sell them below it. There is a limitation on the purchase price. There is a limitation on the sales price, and if we can not sell the securities for less than we paid, it simply means that Uncle Sam is to become the holder of these securities without limit. In other words, the Government proposes to become the owner of these holdings in order to prevent their value depreciating. Therein is the danger of this sort of fiat legislation, to by Government decree supply value which is lacking in the law of supply and demand.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, he would become the holder, but when the railroads are turned back to their owners, of course, these securities would be turned back as a part of the settlement of the account.

Mr. FESS. Yes; that is a relief that helps me a little. The point that is troubling me is this, that we are arranging to hold up the price of securities without any assurance that the Government may ever get from under the obligation. That is my fear.

Mr. MADDEN. Legislation would have to follow the surrender of the roads to their owners, which will adjudicate all the differences.

Mr. FESS. That is true. That is some relief. But after all, Mr. Chairman, this is a fiat price fixed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment of my colleague [Mr. LENROOT], as modified by my amendment, may be read.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Stafford amendment, and then the Lenroot amendment as it would read if modified by the Stafford amendment, will be read.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD to the Lenroot amendment: Insert before the pending amendment the following amendment, "to the extent of $200,000,000," and insert the word "further" before the word "limit," so that the Lenroot amendment, as amended, would read: "to the extent of $200,000,000, and within the further limit of appropriations hereafter made therefor by Congress."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the Stafford amendment to the Lenroot amendment.

The question being taken, the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is upon the amendment offered by way of substitute by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY].

Mr. LENROOT. Is the Chair stating that correctly? The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] is not only a substitute for the language that I incorporate in mine, but also seeks to strike out other language in the section, and therefore I submit to the Chair that it is not a substitute for mine in the sense that it is to be voted on before mine. Will the Chair just put it the other way?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair proceeded upon the theory that it was offered by way of substitute. That being the case——

Mr. BARKLEY. I will withdraw so much of my amendment as seeks to strike out language in order that we may separate them and vote upon them separately.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] asks unanimous consent to modify his substitute by withdrawing so much of the same as proposes to strike out certain language.

Mr. BARKLEY. To strike out the language in lines 7, 8, and 9.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, the question is upon the substitute offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] for the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Wisconsin. The question is upon the amendment by way of a substitute.

The question being taken, the amendment in the nature of a substitute was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is upon the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky now offers a further amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BARKLEY: Page 10, line 7, after the word "thereof," strike out the following: "Any sums available from the revolving fund provided in section 6 may be used for such purposes."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, after the word "thereof," on page 10, line 7, the semicolon should be stricken out and a period inserted.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be made.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] to strike out. There has been one argument made in favor of the motion.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I will take the floor in opposition to it if no other member of the committee wishes to speak. Mr. Chairman, I think the proposition to strike out ought to fail. You will remember that the gentleman from Michigan gave as his chief argument the statement that the Committee on Ways and Means is preparing legislation that will cover this purpose. We are passing this legislation now, and I do hope and believe that the railroad-control bill will be passed before the bill reported by the Ways and Means Committee will be passed. But the Ways and Means Committee does not propose to deal with this particular proposition; that is, for the use that we shall make of the revolving fund. I understood the gentleman from Michigan to say that the money might be used for a great many purposes, and that this would be included under the terms of their bill if passed in its present form. But nobody can tell whether it will pass in its present form or not. This revolving fund under the provisions of this bill is intended to make this bill a workable proposition so far as financing the securities and other purposes mentioned by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. What does the gentleman say about these conflicting propositions? The war finance board is only permitted to loan 75 per cent of the value with the indorsement of the local banks, and here the President will be permitted to loan 100 per cent without any indorsement.

Mr. SIMS. This bill only authorizes the President to purchase such securities as may be issued by a particular railroad while under Government control. Your proposition provides that they may loan on these railroad securities whether they were issued after the war or prior thereto.

Mr. FORDNEY. The powers of this board provided in the bill now before the Ways and Means Committee must cease directly after the war.

Mr. SIMS. And this one will not cease until Federal control ceases, and therefore is very different from your bill.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. The railroads in the past have not been limited to any one bank or to any one source from which they borrow, and there is no insuperable objection to their borrowing from the two funds, is there?

Mr. SIMS. No.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I say that in answer to the objection of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit an interruption, I would like to say in regard to the war finance appropriation bill, to which the gentleman from Michigan refers, that in my opinion there are other industries than the railroads that will practically exhaust the resources of the loaning power; and while we hope that it will be sufficient to help out the railroads and the public utilities, I am sure if it exempts all public utilities and railroads and other war industries it will need other help.

Mr. SIMS. That is the line of argument that I was making, and also the line of argument of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY]. We will endanger the perfect and complete and successful operation of this bill if we strike out this provision. It ought not to be done. I think it would prevent the President in the use of the revolving fund from acquiring facilities for the operation of waterways which may be taken over. It is as dangerous as it can be to come here with these limiting propositions, because when you undertake to particularize what may be done you will exclude all except those specified. That is the rule of law. I hope, therefore, that the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan will fail in toto.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Would it not be an incongruous situation to have the President charged with the responsibility of operating these roads and have to go through the process of begging the bankers of the country to loan him the money to finance the roads in receivership or otherwise?

Mr. SIMS. Undoubtedly.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. The gentleman from Michigan spoke about the board being limited to 75 per cent of the par value. Is it not a fact that the Government is in possession of the railroads and will have a large standard return, which will be as much security as the indorsement of the banks?

Mr. SIMS. Yes; and I think much better.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I rise to support the motion of the gentleman from Michigan. The portion of the section which he moves to strike out ought to be eliminated for two reasons: First, it is entirely unnecessary if we grant every statement made as to the need of the railroads by gentlemen on behalf of the committee. In the second place, it is utterly unsound under every principle of finance.

The Ways and Means Committee, as has been said, is preparing a bill presented by the Secretary of the Treasury for the purpose of making advances to railroads and other purposes. When the Secretary came before the committee he stated that the needs of the railways was one of the special reasons why the War Finance Corporation ought to be organized. He desired to use a considerable portion of the money for that purpose. Now, if this money is to go out of the Treasury it is either to go out on sound security or it is to go out on unsound security. If it is going out on sound security, it is going out on security which will have back of it collaterals in the manner provided in the bill before the Ways and Means Committee. If it is to go out on unsound security—if the object of this bill is to bolster up unsound security—then, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] said, you are creating a sort of fiat currency or fiat bonds bolstered up by the Government credit. It becomes an inflation scheme; a plan to make good securities out of bad ones. Possibly there was a time when the Nation's Treasury could easily take care of millions in bad investments and its credit still remain good, our resources unshaken. But to-day we are engaged in a war which taxes every power and strains every resource. Every day we are told that we need a billion here, five hundred millions there, and still gentlemen go on and on as if the money and credit of this country were bounded only by infinity. I warn the House that there is a limit, and we are approaching it.

The bill which is before the Ways and Means Committee provides fully for all exceptional cases. It is true that ordinarily only 75 per cent of the value of the securities can be loaned by the Government, and the loan must be secured by collaterals; but the bill also provides that in exceptional cases where in the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury it is necessary, 100 per cent, the full face value, may be loaned to the concern. The fundamental proposition of the bill which is before the Ways and Means Committee is this: That there are certain corporations that are perfectly solvent, with ample assets behind all of their obligations, but in this period of enormous demands for money which exists in war times, they can not now be financed in the ordinary way. Such corporations, I grant you, ought to be sustained, but only that kind of corporation. If there is some kind of corporation, railroad or otherwise—I care not what it is—that can only be sustained by the Government because it has nothing else to back it, then the Government never ought to put its money into it, and for that reason this motion to strike out offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] ought to be sustained.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. I would like to know if in the calculations before the Committee on Ways and Means at the present time any provision is being made to take care of corporations and business institutions outside of those involved in governmental activities?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Oh, yes. That is expressly understood and provided, and I might say in reference to any question as to there being money enough, this bill before the Ways and Means Committee provides for the issuance of $4,000,000,000 in notes that can be discounted by the Federal reserve banks. In heaven's name how much money do you want; what kind of inflation are we to have if that is not enough? The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN] contended the other day that it could be extended up to $32,000,000,000. I do not know whether he is correct or not; I doubt whether he is; but there will be money enough.

Mr. SNYDER. The gentleman says that money is going to be provided for activities outside of governmental activities.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Oh, yes; for public utilities and all that sort of thing.

Mr. SNYDER. But I am speaking of corporations who are manufacturing so-called nonessentials. What is going to become of them?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not know just where the gentleman would draw the line.

Mr. SNYDER. No one seems to know, and that is what I am trying to draw out.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I presume the Government would not advance the money to help out a corporation that is manufacturing perfumery.

Mr. SNYDER. Is there not a feeling before that committee that nonessentials are not to be taken care of?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Oh, yes; that is the understanding.

Mr. SNYDER. That is the understanding—that they are simply to be permitted to shift for themselves and have the right to live as they can, with all of the restrictions that are being thrown around them?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I think that is correct; but we are now considering the railroad matter. The bill before the Committee on Ways and Means will fully take care of the railroads.

Mr. SNYDER. I just wanted to find out the idea of the gentleman and what the sentiment before the committee was in respect to nonessentials.

Mr. MONDELL rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman rise in opposition to the amendment?

Mr. MONDELL. No; I desire to support the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does any gentleman desire to be heard in opposition to the amendment?

Mr. SIMS. I have just been recognized.

Mr. MONDELL. I desire to support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto shall close in five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], and I desire to support it without reference to any action that may be taken by the Committee on Ways and Means in reference to the industrial stabilizing measure now before that committee. We are none of us as yet, I assume, pledged to that legislation. Whether it shall be provided or not, in my opinion, it is both unnecessary and unwise to legislate as now proposed. Under section 6 of this bill the President is authorized out of the $500,000,000 revolving fund to furnish the railways with all of the sums necessary for extensions, improvements, betterments, motive power, and rolling stock, so that the provision which the House is now considering is intended to cover only maturing obligations or securities issued in lieu of maturing obligations, though the language of the provision is rather broad. It is a rather curious and altogether uncomplimentary commentary on Federal control of railways to suggest at the very outset of that control that it may not only be necessary for us to loan money needed for all purposes of betterment and improvements, and to guarantee a definite return, but that in addition to that we must sustain the credit of the roads under Government control by buying their obligations with the people's money. If those obligations are good and sound, or reasonably so, they can be floated. If they are not, the Government is under no obligation, and is doing a very unwise thing when it proposes to take the people's money raised by taxation and the sale of bonds and use it in the purchase of such securities. The effect under the language of the bill would be to enable the Director of Railroads to buy these securities, whether they are sound and stable or no; and if they were not good, if they were not sound, if they did not have sufficient values behind them, then the Government would have unloaded upon its hands, practically for all time, securities of which it could not dispose. It is to be assumed that under Federal control and the stablizing influence of the Federal operation the roads will be able to finance their maturing obligations.

They ought to be able to do it and they will be able to do it unless there arises a condition in the country so disastrous, not only to railway but to all other industrial securities, that it would be useless to attempt to interpose the funds of the Federal Treasury in an effort to stabilize the industrial conditions of the country. We could not do it if we tried. If a condition arose under which any such action would seem to be necessary, it would be futile. It is proposed to do something which in the first place it is not necessary to do and the doing of which is exceedingly dangerous from every standpoint of the public interests.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. All debate on this section and all amendments thereto has been closed under unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. TOWNER. By unanimous-consent agreement?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan to strike out certain words.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. GREEN of Iowa) there were—ayes 12, noes 47.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I did not take time to change the heading. The amendment is, in line 4, after the word "interest," strike out down to and including the word "purchases," in line 9, and insert——

Mr. SIMS. We have voted on that once.

Mr. LENROOT. I have incorporated all the amendments. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return later for this purpose only. It is a perfecting amendment, that is all.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that this paragraph may be passed temporarily, with permission to return at a later time for the purpose of offering a perfecting amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LENROOT. I withdraw my amendment for the time being.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That the President may execute any of the powers herein and heretofore granted him with relation to Federal control through such agencies as he may determine, and may fix the reasonable compensation for the performance of services in connection therewith, and may avail himself of the advice, assistance, and cooperation of the Interstate Commerce Commission and of the members and employees thereof, and may also call upon any department, commission, or board of the Government for such services as he may deem expedient. But no such official or employee of the United States shall receive any additional compensation for such services except as now permitted by law.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PARKER of New Jersey: Page 10, line 25, at the end of section 8, after the words "permitted by law," insert "that the carriers shall retain their officers, agents, corporate existence, and management, subject to control of the President, except when otherwise particularly ordered by the President."

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say only a word. If some of the Members here think about this as I did, there will be a question whether all the agents of the various carriers did not become, under this bill, employees of the Government, subject to political or civil-service appointment, holding all civil-service rights with all sorts of obligations. It is not intended by this bill that that should be so, and this amendment provides that the carriers retain their officers, agents, employees, management, and corporate existence, subject only to the control of the President, except where the President issues a particular order, which means as to any particular employee.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced the ayes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. SIMS) there were—ayes 26, noes 38.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. Tellers are demanded. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Fifteen gentlemen have arisen; not a sufficient number, and tellers are refused.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10, after line 25, insert a new paragraph to read as follows:
"No person employed in connection with the operation of railroads or systems of transportation under Federal control, except those persons referred to in the preceding paragraph of this section, shall be deemed to be an officer or employee under the United States for the purpose of title 2 of an act entitled 'An act to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes,' approved October 3, 1917, commonly called the war excess-profits tax, nor shall he be deemed to be a civil employee of the United States within the meaning of the act entitled 'An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injury while in the performance of their duty, and for other purposes,' approved September 7, 1916."

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to that amendment. I have given it study.

Mr. LENROOT. I do not care to discuss it.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That nothing in this act shall be construed to affect the routing instructions over and the traffic arrangements of such railroads as may not be taken under Federal control by the President unless such arrangements and instructions prejudice the transportation of war materials or of Government supplies; in which case the President may change the routing of such materials and supplies as the war and national interests demand. If the President should deem it necessary temporarily to suspend such arrangements and instructions as to freight other than war materials and Government supplies, he may thereafter, so far as practicable, cause to be diverted sufficient unrouted freight to such road as will compensate it in revenue for such temporary suspension.

Mr. SNOOK. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 11, line 4, after the word "control," insert the words "or the control of which may be relinquished."

Mr. SNOOK. Now, Mr. Chairman, under section 14 of the bill the President has power to relinquish the control of certain railroads after July 1, 1918, and this amendment is simply to give those roads the benefit the same as those which are not taken over. It meets the approval of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee a question. Section 9 of this bill as originally drafted has been stricken out. I have been informed that this was done at the request of the representative of the heads of the railway brotherhoods, and that it was upon their insistence that no workmen's compensation provision is incorporated in this bill.

Mr. SIMS. I think I can state it correctly; and that is not exactly correct. One gentleman representing the railway trainmen appeared before the committee and opposed any legislation on the subject at all, so as to leave the employers' liability act to apply. But there was no representative of other members of the brotherhood that came before the committee and made any statement whatever. But I have myself received a number of letters and requests and resolutions from local bodies of railway trainmen, perhaps some of all of them, opposing any legislation in reference to the workmen's compensation act in this bill. But I would not say it was stricken out on account of their opposition or approval, but after studying the whole matter as best we could we thought it was a good thing to strike it out and not undertake to deal with it at all, because it is no essential part of the operation of railways while in Federal control.

Mr. SWITZER. Did not Mr. Doak, who appeared before the committee, as shown by the hearings, represent the four brotherhoods?

Mr. SIMS. No, sir; he did not.

Mr. SWITZER. What did he represent?

Mr. SIMS. I have forgotten what it was.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Doak stated that, while he only represented one brotherhood officially, he was spokesman for all four.

Mr. SIMS. He did not come to represent them. He said he was the spokesman. In other words, he was representing what they approved, but their official representative did not appear before the committee and make any statement.

Mr. SWITZER. But they did send Mr. Doak?

Mr. SIMS. I have it here. I may be in error, as I am stating it from my recollection.

Mr. SWITZER. Your committee did not come to any decision to strike this out until he made the request?

Mr. SIMS. We had not acted on any provision in the bill at all. He came before us in the hearings before we had acted on any section.

Mr. SWITZER. One other question. Was not the bill redrafted after it was referred to your committee, and did not the redraft still contain the workmen's compensation provision?

Mr. SIMS. The bill was drafted three different times, for this reason: In order to have all amendments which the committee had agreed to in one bill, and not have the Members come in here and offer them as separate committee amendments; and that was done by unanimous consent after the bill was reported—that is, the final draft—so as not to have so many committee amendments offered that the committee had already agreed to. The bill was drafted first before any amendments were offered at all. Afterwards it was introduced again as the committee then agreed to report it, but after that had been done the committee still decided to make further amendments, which were made, and then it was introduced in its final form. But what the gentleman says was not the cause of this redraft, but it was redrafted with reference to what amendments the committee had decided to put in the bill. Now, what Mr. Doak said——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, I have not had a minute's time during the consideration of this bill, and I ask unanimous consent for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Doak said:

> In appearing here to-day I do so in behalf of the four railroad brotherhoods and especially for the purpose of discussing briefly the provision pertaining to workmen's compensation.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman permit me one moment?

Mr. SWITZER. Just two more questions, and then I will yield to the gentleman. This bill was originally drafted by a representative of the administration and is known as the administration railway bill?

Mr. SIMS. You mean as it was originally drafted?

Mr. SWITZER. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. As originally drafted it was drafted with a view of carrying out the President's proclamation.

Mr. SWITZER. So the redraft I referred to carried the workmen's compensation?

Mr. SIMS. The redraft covered simply amendments that were agreed to by the committee after the original bill was introduced.

Mr. SWITZER. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE].

Mr. MONTAGUE. I wish to say to the gentleman, and I think I do not betray the confidence of the committee, I made the motion in the committee to strike out section 9. There were two considerations impelling that motion, one that I thought it was unconstitutional in that it delegated legislative power to the President, and second, to preserve the idea carried in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] a few minutes since.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman from Virginia, that I believe that this section 9 as originally drafted delegated to the President legislative powers and that therefore it was clearly unconstitutional. I made some remarks upon the floor of this House a few weeks ago, and I further opposed this section 9 as originally drafted, for the reason that I believed that the administration of the compensation law would be freer from political influences and interferences if it was placed under the jurisdiction of the United States courts; that is, if the initial complaint was lodged before a referee appointed by a United States district judge, and have a right to review, and transfer of jurisdiction, with the ultimate right of trial by jury; that in this way the interests of all parties, the employees and the railways and the Government and the people, would be best conserved. But I regret very much that the spokesman, as we will call him, for the railway brotherhoods at this time assumed the antagonistic attitude indicated by the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, for I believe that this is the opportune time to have passed a national workmen's compensation law, covering under it the employees of the interstate railways of this country, certainly with a representative of the administration appearing here and personally requesting certain legislation. If, then, the brotherhoods would have given the principle involved their support it would have been easy to have substituted a workable and acceptable compensation provision for the original draft of the law, and there would have been a certain, adequate, uniform compensation on account of disability or death as a result of injury in interstate railway service throughout the whole country. Now, so far as the spokesman of these railway brotherhoods is concerned, he represented the Railway Trainmen.

Of all the men who need the benefit of a workmen's compensation law it is the railway trainmen. Some one has misled this order and had them go on record against the workmen's compensation law. But so far as the locomotive engineers are concerned, they are unanimous for a workmen's compensation law. The conductors are passive. I believe the firemen have taken no action on it.

Here is a man who says he represents 130,000 employees out of probably 1,400,000 employees of the interstate railways of this country. I believe that merely upon the request of that spokesman this provision has been eliminated from this bill. I know it is futile to offer an amendment. I presume it would be ruled out if a point of order were made, and if a point of order is not made, with the activities of these railway brotherhoods against it, it would fail. I recognize that, but it seems to me that the heads of the railway brotherhoods, if they at all favor such a proposition, have made a serious mistake, and I think now, over and above all other times, it is necessary that we should have such legislation.

I think the representative of the administration was right in recommending a compensation system, while I do not agree with his proposed method for its initiation and administration. There will be transported over these railroads thousands and thousands of tons of high explosives, and there will be congestion of freight, as there has been this winter, and so long as the war goes on, and the employees will be subjected to greater dangers than heretofore, and with the additional instances of danger it will be impossible for the railway employee to prove the injury suffered is any fault of the carrier. It will be impossible to prove negligence, and it will continue, as it has been in the past, that about one-third of those who are injured and about 15 to 20 per cent of the dependents of those who are killed by accidents will receive compensation, and those who do finally recover against the railroads will probably have to pay one-third or one-half of what they receive to their attorneys.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWITZER. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I would like to say to my colleague from Ohio that that part of the workmen's compensation law was stricken out of this bill. I do not believe the President had any power at all under the wording of that section to take in the employees of the railroads of this country in workmen's compensation.

Mr. SWITZER. I so stated. I believe that the original draft of the section delegated powers that are unconstitutional. I do not think it should have been placed under the Federal Workmen's Compensation Commission, because I believe that a system ought to be originated at this time and adopted that would apply to these railroads after we release them and after they go back to private control, something that would be workable in peace times as well as in war times.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWITZER. I yield.

Mr. TOWNER. In the bill H. R. 8172, where I think it was perhaps the first amendment, I noticed not only the objection of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE], but, it seems to me, it would be objectionable also upon the ground that by inference, at least, it would take away from the employees the benefits conferred under the employees' liability act.

Mr. SWITZER. I think they should be taken away, and we should substitute therefor a proper workmen's compensation law.

Mr. TOWNER. That may be; but a workmen's compensation act was not a suitable substitute for the workmen's liability act.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, I am in accord with the railway brotherhood heads when it comes to the provision as proposed in this bill. I believe it should have been eliminated. But I believe that this is the time and this is the hour, when the administration was demanding something in their behalf, when they should have joined hands for the principle, and instead of having a few of their subordinates out in the country telegraphing you to oppose this measure, they should have telegraphed to you that they were against the provision in the bill but favored a liberal compensation system, and it would easily have been put into this bill. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has again expired.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LENROOT: Page 11, line 11, strike out the words "nothing in this act shall be construed" and insert "the President, in the exercise of the authority given to him by this act or by the act entitled 'An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes,' approved August 29, 1916, shall not."

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, the importance of section 9——

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. Has the section been read?

Mr. LENROOT. This is section 9. The importance of section 9 is not as great, of course, now, since the amendment of my colleague [Mr. ESCH] has been adopted, taking in all the short-line roads that are competing roads. But nevertheless this amendment, which is merely a perfecting amendment, ought to be adopted, as it seems to me.

What is the language that I seek to strike out? "That nothing in this act shall be construed to affect the routing instructions," and so forth. The intention of course, was to deprive the President of any power to affect the routing instructions except in the cases mentioned later on in this section.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. BARKLEY. What is the necessity for your amendment? because the act of 1916 does not touch the question of routing instructions and traffic agreements. Why is it necessary to go to the extent of more detail and stating what the President can not do under these two acts when the language in the bill already indicates it?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad, indeed, to find so many Members on that side give the same construction to the act of 1916 that I have given to it in the past, namely, that the act of 1916 does not give to the President any greater powers than the railroad themselves had prior to being taken over.

Mr. BARKLEY. I hope the gentleman will not construe my question as indicating that I approve of that construction that he places upon the act of 1916. My point is that, in view of the fact that the act of 1916 does not go into detail as to how the President shall control the roads and this is the only act which mentions that in detail, it is not necessary to mention any other act except this one in this particular section.

Mr. LENROOT. Let me say then, was it the gentleman's idea, inasmuch as the act of 1916 did not go into detail, but that the President had absolutely plenary power to affect routing instructions as well as other matters, that it was the intention of the committee to leave that power in the President, that he could affect routing instructions as he saw fit?

Mr. BARKLEY. The power that the act of 1916 conferred upon the President is limited by whatever provisions are included in this bill. In other words, the act that we are now attempting to pass is a limitation upon the powers that may have been conferred in the act of 1916; and, granting the suggestion that the President had plenary power to affect routing instructions under the act of 1916 if unamended, this provision and the provisions of this entire bill limit his authority under that act, even if construed to be entirely plenary.

Mr. LENROOT. Very well, then. Let me see if I get the gentleman's position. If the President then had the power under the act of 1916 to affect routing instructions as he saw fit, the gentleman then desires that he continue to have that power to affect routing instructions except as limited by this bill. Is that true?

Mr. BARKLEY. That is necessarily true, not only as to routing but as to all other powers conferred by the act of 1916.

Mr. LENROOT. Then it was not the intention of the committee to afford the protection to the short-line roads as to routing instructions by limiting the power of the President, except as it might be limited by other provisions of the act.

Mr. BARKLEY. Our contention is that the language of this section as now written does limit the President's authority in accordance with its own terms, and that he can go no further under the act of 1916 than he is allowed to go under this section in the matter of rerouting traffic and instructions.

Mr. LENROOT. Then, may I ask the gentleman what the committee meant in the very next section of the bill, wherein the language is found that nothing herein contained shall be construed as modifying or restricting the powers heretofore conferred upon the President? In one breath the gentleman says this bill now does limit the power of the President under the act of 1916, and in just a few moments he will declare that the power of the President is not limited.

Mr. BARKLEY. Except as provided in the bill. You have got, of course, to put a reasonable construction on the language, that, in so far as the bill itself does not restrict the President, he shall not be limited.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LENROOT. I ask five minutes more.

Mr. SIMS. Does the gentleman think he needs it?

Mr. LENROOT. I do not think I need it; but it seems difficult to convince some gentlemen upon that side upon a very plain and simple proposition.

Mr. SNYDER. May we have the amendment read?

Mr. CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman will yield, without taking it out of his time, the amendment will be again reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 11, line 1, strike out the words "nothing in this act shall be construed" and insert "the President, in the exercise of the authority given to him by this act or by the act entitled 'An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and for other purposes,' approved August 29, 1916, shall not."

Mr. LENROOT. Now, Mr. Chairman, my amendment will simply say in plain language that the President shall not have the power to affect the routing instructions over or traffic arrangements of such railroads, except as is particularly given in this section. That is all my amendment does. And why should the President be given any greater power? Why should we resort to any implied powers if you are going to give any protection to short-line roads by this section? And that is the only purpose of it. Why should not the powers of the President be directly restricted rather than to say "Nothing in this act shall be construed to affect" when there is a serious question whether there is anything in the act that will.

Mr. SIMS. Has the gentleman concluded his remarks?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB], in general debate, explained fully about this section; but, as always happens in general debate, Members do not attend as well as they do when we are reading the paragraphs of the bill for amendment, and perhaps some of the gentlemen here did not hear the statement of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB]. But I can say from my own knowledge that the bill, before section 9 was put in as here drawn on page 11, had provisions covering short-line railroads—weak roads, roads in receiverships, and so forth, taken over, where it would be an injustice to them to apply the provisions of the standard return. But there was no legislation in the bill to prevent the taking over of roads from injuring other roads not taken over; and the representatives of 115 roads—I think, all of those in the South—and some presidents of short-line railroads came to me with the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] and brought this provision, just as it is in this bill, and asked that it be included in the bill.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] was also consulted about it, and the provision that is in here now was prepared by the attorneys and officials representing short-line railroads that might not be taken over or might be relinquished after they were taken over. Now, if the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] knows better what these men want than they know themselves, if he knows better than their lawyers know what it will take to get it, perhaps he can convince the House; but after the amendment was prepared with so much care by those to be affected by it I do not want to consent to any kind of an amendment; and where it is mere verbiage, mere trimmings, mere frills, even though the gentleman may have had the assistance of the most expert bill drafter in the country, I do think that, where those interested and those to be affected by the legislation have prepared and accepted it, the House is going pretty far to amend it in any way whatever. Therefore I am opposed to any amendment, because this is the finished product of those who knew what they wanted in this bill, and I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be recognized in reply to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. SIMS. But the gentleman has already had 10 minutes.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; but the gentleman has made some statements that I want to reply to. I move to strike out the last word. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Tennessee, instead of replying to the argument I made, has told you how this paragraph was drafted. I am not going into the merits of the case, because the gentleman did not go into the merits or attempt to reply to the argument I made as to the necessity of the amendment. But certainly I am surprised at the gentleman from Tennessee making a statement that because some group of interested men handed into the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce an amendment that was satisfactory to them, therefore the House of Representatives, representing the general public, should not be at liberty to make such amendments as it sees fit.

The gentleman made another statement—that I had the benefit of one of the most expert draftsmen of the country in preparing the amendments that I have offered. That is true. I am glad that I had the assistance of that gentleman, and I want to say to the eminent chairman of this committee that if the committee had had the assistance of the same gentleman we would have expedited the passage of this bill and there would not have been in the bill the crudities and absurdities that are now found in it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That nothing herein contained shall be construed as modifying or restricting the powers heretofore conferred upon the President to take possession and assume control of any or all systems of transportation; and the President, in addition to the powers conferred by this act, shall have and is hereby given such other and further powers necessary or appropriate to give effect to the powers herein and heretofore conferred. The provisions of this act shall also apply to any carriers to which Federal control may be hereafter extended.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 11, after figure 10 in line 14, strike out the language down to and including the word "transportation" in line 17, and insert the following in lieu thereof:

"The provisions of the act entitled 'An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes, approved August 29, 1916,' shall remain in force and effect, except as modified and restricted by this act."

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, in the discussion to which we have just listened, between the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], section 10, which I now seek to amend, was referred to. The act of August 29, 1916, "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes," contained a section under which the President, by his proclamation, has taken over the possession and the control of the railroads. Able lawyers have given it as their opinion that the Interstate Commerce Commission, for instance, was shorn of its regulatory power by the act of the President in taking over the transportation companies of the country under the provisions of the law which I have mentioned. Now, what does section 10, as written in this bill, provide? It says—

That nothing herein contained shall be construed as modifying or restricting the powers heretofore conferred upon the President to take possession and assume control of any or all systems of transportation.

Now, then, suppose that the House, when we reach the section of the bill dealing with freight rates, decides to give the President the power to initiate freight rates, fares, and charges by filing the same with the Interstate Commerce Commission in such form and at such time and upon such notice as he shall direct, but that in the same connection we should see fit to retain the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission in its power to determine as to the justness and fairness of rates. Then we are at once confronted with the provisions of section 10 of the bill to which I have already referred, which says that nothing we do in this pending bill shall be held to modify or limit the authority given the President under the Army appropriation act of 1916. It seems to me that the language is an error, in view of what we are seeking to accomplish in the legislation which we are now considering.

Therefore, I propose an amendment which says that the authority and power which we conferred upon the President in that act of 1916 shall remain in full force and effect, except where it is modified and restricted by the limitations of this act; and therefore, if my amendment is adopted, there would be no ambiguity in the language of the bill and its meaning would be clearly and perfectly understood.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is it not a principle of law that always the last announcement of the legislature on any subject is the law; that it repeals by implication any other law inconsistent with the provisions of the subsequent act?

Mr. BLACK. As a general proposition, that is true; but the language of section 10 is peculiar and I think unusual, and I think it would be better to state in this bill, as my amendment does clearly state, that all the powers we conferred on the President in that act of August 29, 1916, shall remain in full force and effect except where restricted and modified by this act.

Mr. BARKLEY. The object of it is to reserve all the implied powers under the act of 1916, and this act which may be necessary to carry out the powers given to the President. I think this language is as far as it is necessary to go in limiting the President and leaving in him the implied necessary powers.

Mr. BLACK. Would not my amendment make clearer the intent of Congress, because it provides that all authority and power which the President now exercises in his control of railways under laws heretofore made shall remain unimpaired except as herein modified?

Mr. BARKLEY. No; there might be implied power in the act of 1916 which ought to remain.

Mr. BLACK. Under my amendment it would undoubtedly still remain. Unless it is changed or modified by some specific provision of the act which we are now about to pass. The bill as now written says that nothing herein contained shall be construed as modifying or restricting the powers heretofore conferred upon the President, by the act of 1916.

Mr. BARKLEY. In taking possession and assuming control.

Mr. BLACK. That is the power that was indeed given the President in that act, and, as I said in the outset of my remarks, the interpretation that some eminent lawyers have placed upon the effect of the President taking control of the railroads under such act was to sweep away all jurisdiction and power that have been granted to the Interstate Commerce Commission under laws heretofore passed. I therefore take the position that Congress ought to make it clear that what we intend to do in this act is to leave to the President all the powers he has under the act of 1916, except where they are modified and limited by this particular act. That certainly is the intention of Congress, and it should be made quite clear, so that no confusion may arise in interpreting the two acts. I therefore hope that my amendment will be adopted.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I wish to support the amendment.

Mr. SIMS. I am opposed to the amendment, but if the gentleman from Wisconsin is to support it I will wait until I hear what he says.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, this amendment proposed by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] certainly ought to be adopted. Unless the amendment is adopted, we have this situation, that this bill says in one section one thing and in the next section directly the opposite. The gentleman talks about this being the usual language that is found in all bills. I challenge the gentleman to point to any law that was ever passed by Congress that had any such language in it as this. What is the language?

That nothing herein contained shall be construed as modifying or restricting the powers heretofore conferred upon the President—

And so forth.

Yet, in the preceding section, they frankly state that by that section they do modify and restrict the powers of the President. Later on, in section 12, they again state that in that section they do modify and restrict the powers of the President. Yet in this section they say nothing in the act shall be construed to limit or modify or restrict the powers of the President. Mr. Chairman, with all due respect to the chairman of the committee and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], a high-school debating society would not think of supporting such a contention as the gentleman now makes. What possible objection is there to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Texas, which is merely that the powers of the President under the act of 1916 shall not be in the slightest degree affected except as they are modified by this act. Is not that what you mean? Is not that what you want? Why not say so in the English language? You have not said so, but you have said something directly the opposite. You are trying to get the committee to say something that you yourselves say ought not to be true. In other words, you are saying that although in a part of this bill we have modified and restricted the powers of the President, you insist now in putting into the bill a provision that we have not done what we say we have done.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, before commencing a reply to this I desire to make a statement in regard to what the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] said a few moments ago upon another matter, so that the House may not misunderstand. The gentleman said that if the chairman of this committee had had the advantage of the gentleman's advice to whom he referred there would not have been as many objectionable things in the bill as there are. I think, in justice to the House and in justice to the gentleman referred to—and I am not going to mention the name, but the gentleman from Wisconsin knows who is referred to—I should say that as chairman of the committee, upon the recommendation of Members of the House as to his ability to assist in the proper framing of legislation, I invited this gentleman to attend the hearings on this bill all the way through, and he did so, and when we began to consider the bill in executive session I proposed to the committee that he be invited to come in and remain during those sittings, not for the purpose of asking what ought to be in the bill in the way of legislation or anything of that sort, but to assist the committee in using the proper language to clearly express what the committee desired to express.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Wait until I get through with the statement.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I want to get the name of this gentleman.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have order. I would like to have the attention of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I am listening.

Mr. SIMS. I submitted that proposition to the committee.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Was this in the gentleman's committee?

Mr. SIMS. In the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and gave the reasons for it fully.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I protest. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee if he thinks this is a proper discussion?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I want the facts. This is not a discussion, it is a statement of the facts.

Mr. RAYBURN. Is it proper to disclose matters that happened in that committee in reference to a man who is not connected with it in any way?

Mr. SIMS. I want to say, in justice to the gentleman who has been referred to, and to let Members know that he was not rejected on account of any objections to him; but it was stated by some members of the committee that it was an unusual proceeding with that committee, and the bill might be submitted to him for his advice after it was perfected. Some gentleman of the committee offered a motion to admit him, and I said "No"; it would be embarrassing to him and an injustice to him, unless it could be done by the unanimous consent of the entire committee. That is the only reason he was not invited and why we did not have the benefit of his presence. But I want to say that that gentleman did not indicate that he wanted to in any way control the legislation or to shape any provision of the bill, but only to aid us as we ourselves might want his advice as to the framing of the bill, and the implication that might be drawn from what the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] said, that we thought we did not need any help, is erroneous. As one member of the committee, I was very glad to get assistance from any source, and that is the reason why the gentleman whom the gentleman from Wisconsin consulted was not consulted by us as a committee.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I object to any further discussion of this representative of somebody here to instruct the committee how to draw a bill.

Mr. MADDEN. What is this gentleman's name?

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman from Wisconsin can give the name of the gentleman.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SIMS. There has been objection to further discussion of the incident.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will not the gentleman yield for a question? I want to ask the name of this gentleman.

Mr. SIMS. I suggest the gentleman ask the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, this is an amendment proposed to section 10. The committee has not considered this amendment; it has not been offered to the committee. It has not been discussed; it is not among the amendments which the gentleman from Wisconsin proposed, as printed in the RECORD.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield? The gentleman was speaking about some outsider who was invited to sit in with the committee. May I ask the gentleman who that party was?

Mr. SIMS. There has been objection to my saying anything about what transpired in the committee. The gentleman can find out by asking the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. LENROOT. He is a very good man.

Mr. SIMS. My opinion would confirm every word the gentleman has said [laughter] as to his being a very good man.

Mr. STAFFORD. This is a mutual admiration society.

Mr. SIMS. I hope we may now have attention to the amendment itself.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, may I ask unanimous consent to have five minutes more?

Mr. KNUTSON. May I ask the gentleman another question?

Mr. SIMS. No.

The CHAIRMAN The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman has not declined to yield.

Mr. SIMS. I have on this matter.

Mr. KNUTSON. I only want information, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman will not get it on that point.

Mr. KNUTSON. Was this a star-chamber session?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Texas, striking out a portion of section 10, just referred to, and inserting other language has not been considered by the committee. It may have been considered by some members of the committee, but I mean it has not been considered by the committee as a committee. I never heard of it until read.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. What is the gentleman's construction of the language that he has in his bill? What does the gentleman say in definition of the language that is moved to be stricken out?

Mr. SIMS. I do not think it needs any definition.

Mr. SHERLEY. Some of us do.

Mr. SIMS. I can not prevent gentlemen from having that opinion.

Mr. SHERLEY. But the gentleman is in charge of the bill.

Mr. SIMS. I am going to state to the gentleman, if given a chance, that this language with reference to the power of the President was submitted to the legal authorities that advised the President——

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, well, if the gentleman will permit——

Mr. SIMS. It was submitted to some of the ablest lawyers I know of in the United States who were available, and it has been considered by the committee and accepted in its entirety just as it is, and therefore I am pinning my faith to the ability of the gentleman who framed this section, who has passed upon it in its entirety, and I am not willing, even if I individually took the same position that the gentleman from Texas does in his amendment, to insist on it over the advice of those who have passed upon this question and put my own judgment over theirs. I would still let this section remain as it is. The Senate passed this section as it is without any amendment whatever, and they certainly have some able lawyers in the Senate and some of its Members know what the language used means, and even though an expert on these matters may have given a different opinion I am not willing to overrule what has been adopted by the committee and has passed the Senate, and which I can see no reason whatever to change.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. As I understand, the gentleman's bill covers two propositions. One is the provision for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, and the other is for compensation to the owners of those systems.

Mr. SIMS. Yes; and other matters.

Mr. WINGO. That is the point I want to ask the gentleman about.

Mr. SIMS. Compensation is a contract provision.

Mr. WINGO. I am talking about the broad substantive proposition the gentleman's bill deals with, and, as I understand, there are two; one is compensating the owners for the use of these properties and to provide for the operation of the property under Federal control. Has the gentleman provided for anything else in his bill?

Mr. SIMS. We provide for a great many things in this bill.

Mr. WINGO. Name some of them.

Mr. SIMS. I mean details as to how it is to be done.

Mr. WINGO. I am talking about the broad substantive legislation. Does the gentleman undertake to provide anything with relation to the change of the authority of the President in taking over railroad lines?

Mr. SIMS. We aim to give him all the authority he has so far exercised and that contained in this bill and every portion of it——

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman does not answer the question.

Mr. SIMS. And certain enlargements also of authority as contained in this bill.

Mr. WINGO. What I want to know is if this bill deals with anything except two things—one the operation of these transportation sys ems in the first place, and then as to the compensation to the owners. Is there any other substantive legislation?

Mr. SIMS. There are the financial provisions in the bill in reference to the purchase of securities and selling them and everything of that kind.

Mr. WINGO. That comes under the head of operation, does it not?

Mr. SIMS. Not necessarily at all.

Mr. WINGO. Is there any provision in the bill that undertakes to change the authority of the President in reference to the power he has under prior acts?

Mr. SIMS. No; only to supplement them and add thereto.

Mr. WINGO. If there is one, point it out to me. I can not find it——

Mr. SIMS. I will confess to the gentleman that his inquiry calls for such details I can not do so right now.

Mr. WINGO. I am asking the gentleman in a broad way to show me some——

Mr. SIMS. It is intended to be very broad, and, if necessary, to execute and carry out the provisions of this bill.

Mr. WINGO. I am not talking about this section. I am asking about the bill. Show me any other section of the bill that will provide anything other than the two things I have named, in a substantial way; that is, operation of these lines and consequent compensation to the owners.

Mr. SIMS. In addition to the authority for taking them over?

Mr. WINGO. Have you any section that will give the President authority to take them over? I thought you covered that by prior legislation.

Mr. SIMS. They were taken over by prior legislation.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with great interest to the discussion of this legal proposition. It seems to me that there is one difficulty springing from the too broad interpretation given to the first part of section 10. In reading section 10 we find it says:

> That nothing herein contained shall be construed as modifying or restricting the powers heretofore conferred upon the President to take possession or assume control of any or all systems of transportation.

Now, that section has been discussed as though it read that nothing said in this act shall limit the power of the President. But the language is used in a very limited sense—it shall not limit the power of the President but only in the matter of the taking possession and assuming control. And the purpose of the bill is to guard that power sacredly, because that is the essence of the prior law. I do not think there is anything in section 10 that is in conflict with section 9, but both can be read and interpreted together. Section 9 relates to an unrelated subject; section 10 relates to the taking over and control of the roads that are to be taken over. Section 9 relates particularly to and affects those roads that are not taken over, and therefore it would seem to me, not having the benefit of conference in committee or discussion of the bill except here upon the floor, as though the amendment which has been proposed is quite unnecessary to carry out the purposes and intent of this bill.

One word further, and that is that if section 11 were changed by this committee that would not interfere with the language of section 10, for that would relate to the making of rates and not to the "taking possession and control," which in my interpretation means taking physical possession and physical control, or, in other words, the operation of the roads.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. My interpretation is the same as the interpretation of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but I want to ask the gentleman whether he does not know that the President, under the terms "possession and control," assumes the power to make rates, to make traffic arrangements, and do everything there is in connection with the railroads; and in that construction is not this amendment necessary?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. No; for the reason that I do not know that the President does assume to do these things. I am now as a legislator reading the language of the bill that is before the House, and reading that language only, it would seem to me the meaning I have stated is the reasonable and natural interpretation of the language and the one which any court of this land would adopt.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. DEMPSEY. How would you possibly construe this as affecting rates when a separate section deals with rates? Does not that in and of itself negative the possibility of any such interpretation?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Certainly, and any court reading the entire bill would say that that was true.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The power conferred upon the President to take possession and assume control of systems of transportation is derived solely from the act which was referred to in the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK], is it not?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. The act of 1916 says:

> The President in time of war is empowered through the Secretary of War to take possession and assume control of any system or systems of transportation or any part thereof.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. So that, as it seems to me, under the amendment of the gentleman from Texas, it comes right back to that same thing. He referred to that act.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. It is not the point as to whether his amendment refers to that act or not. The point is, Is that amendment necessary to make this piece of legislation clear or is the language which the committee has in this bill sufficient to carry the thought through? I merely suggest that the amendment is not necessary.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I care not, touching the quarrel as to who should be selected to do our work for us, whether it is the distinguished adviser of the gentleman from Wisconsin or the adviser of the gentleman from Tennessee. Neither am I satisfied with an answer that tells me that the advice was wise and given by distinguished gentlemen, and therefore should be accepted.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. No. If that position is to be followed, this committee ought to dispense with the reading of the bill and pass it as it is. [Applause.] Of course, nobody seriously contends anything of that kind.

I think the language as stated here ought not to be in the bill, notwithstanding the statement made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM]. I think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] ought itself to be modified by having added to it the word "express," so that you would not be modifying the act under which the President took over the railroads, by implication, but only by express provision. But you ought not to put in here a statement that is either meaningless or untrue. Because this act does modify some of his power——

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. In just a moment.

Some of his power to take possession and assume control.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Well, does it modify his power to assume control? That means taking possession physically and assuming control of the road.

Mr. SHERLEY. Assuming control means something more than what the gentleman undertakes to limit the words to. At least, it may mean very much more than that, and it strikes me as an unwise proposition to write into an act that you are passing that it shall not be construed as modifying this previous act. Now, the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK], after designating the act under which the President got the power to take over the railroads, says that such act "shall remain in full force and effect, except as modified and restricted by this act." Now, I would modify his amendment by putting in front of the word "modified" the word "expressly," so that it would read, "except as expressly modified and restricted by this act"; and I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM], who is a good lawyer, whether the amendment so modified could by any possibility interfere with those powers that the President got under the former act and which we desire through this legislation to let him continue to have and exercise?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. No; I do not think they would interfere, but I say that the language that the committee has reported to the House is sufficient to protect those rights. Hence the amendment is unnecessary.

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, I do not agree to the gentleman's premise, that the assumption of control means literally assuming control in the sense of taking possession only. Assumption of control means the management of these railroads, and among other things the fixing of rates and other matters concerning which we are expressly laying down a rule for, and therefore I am not willing to take the chance that his construction of the language would require, and I ask this House not to take it.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment by inserting the word "expressly" before the word "modified," so that the amendment will read——

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified, and indicating how it will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modified amendment by Mr. BLACK: On page 11, after figure "10" on line 14, strike out the language down to and including the word "transportation" in line 17, and insert the following in lieu thereof: "The provisions of the act entitled 'An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes,' approved August 29, 1916, shall remain in force and effect except as expressly modified and restricted by this act."

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK].

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the "ayes" appeared to have it.

Mr. SIMS. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 87, noes 21.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. That carriers while under Federal control shall, in so far as is not inconsistent therewith, or with the provisions of this act, or any other act applicable to such Federal control, or with any order of the President, be subject to all laws and liabilities as common carriers, whether arising under State or Federal laws or at common law. Suits may be brought by and against such carriers and judgments rendered as now provided by law; and in any suit against the carrier, no defense shall be made thereto upon the ground that the carrier is an instrumentality or agency of the Federal Government. But no process, mesne or final, shall be levied against any property under such Federal control.

Until and except so far as the President shall from time to time otherwise order, the rates, fares, charges, classification, regulations, and practices of carriers under Federal control shall during the period of Federal control continue to be and to be determined as hitherto. But when in the judgment of the President it is necessary in the public interest he may initiate rates, fares, charges, classifications, regulations, or practices, or changes therein by filing the same with the Interstate Commerce Commission in such form and at such time and upon such notice as he shall direct. All rates, fares, charges, classifications, regulations, and practices, or changes therein so ordered, shall be fair, reasonable, and just; and the Interstate Commerce Commission shall upon complaint make investigation and grant full hearings concerning the fairness, justice, and reasonableness of any rates, fares, charges, classifications, regulations, or practices, or changes therein so ordered by the President; and shall make report of its findings and recommendations concerning the same (which findings and recommendations shall prima facie be taken as correct) to the President for such action as the President may deem required in the public interest. That nothing in this act shall be construed to amend, repeal, impair, or affect the existing laws or powers of the States in relation to taxation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington, Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, Mr. SWEET, Mr. COOPER of Ohio, and Mr. DEMPSEY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET], a member of the committee, offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SWEET: Strike out all on pages 12 and 13, commencing with the word "Until," in line 12, on page 12, and ending with the word "interest," in line 8, page 13, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the jurisdiction and power over the rates, fares, charges, and classifications of common carriers which prior to Federal control were lodged in the Interstate Commerce Commission by the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, and the amendments thereto, shall continue in the Interstate Commerce Commission, and said commission shall retain full jurisdiction over the rates, fares, charges, and classifications of the said carriers and all governmental agencies referred to or created by this act; but during the period of said Federal control said commission in determining any question arising under this act shall consider all the facts and circumstances arising under the war emergency and growing out of the unified, coordinated Federal control occasioned thereby. This shall not be construed as interfering with the control by the President or any agency created by him of the operation as distinguished from the rates, fares, charges, and classifications of said carriers subject to Federal control."

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I want to see if we can not get a unanimous-consent agreement. I would like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] if we can not make an agreement as to the amount of time for debate on this amendment and any amendment that may be offered thereto or to this portion of the bill, the gentleman from Wisconsin to control the time agreed to on that side and myself to control the time on this side?

Mr. ESCH. I will consult gentlemen on this side and inform the gentleman.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman [Mr. SWEET] who just offered the amendment if he does not think an amendment just preceding his had better come first? I desire to offer one in line 9, just after the words "Federal Government." It in no wise treats of the same feature as his.

Mr. LENROOT. Let us dispose of one at a time.

Mr. SWEET. The general opinion seems to be that we will take up this rate question first.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Then it is understood this will not cut me out from offering that amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky will have the opportunity to present his amendment.

Mr. ESCH. I think we would require at least an hour on this side.

Mr. SIMS. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET] and other amendments to this section shall close in one hour, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] to control half the time and I to control the other half.

Mr. ESCH. I said we would want an hour on this side.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask that all debate on this amendment and other amendments to this section close in two hours, one hour to be controlled by the gentleman from Wisconsin and the other hour to be controlled by myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the debate on the pending amendment and other amendments to the section close in two hours, one half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Wisconsin and the other half to be controlled by himself. Is there objection?

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if it is understood that we are to pass this bill to-day?

Mr. SIMS. There is no agreement to do it; but we want to do all we can toward it, and I hope that we may complete the consideration of the bill in Committee of the Whole, and such will be my purpose.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. I think we should do it to-day.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I wish to inquire if other amendments to this paragraph after this one will be permitted.

Mr. SIMS. This request goes only to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin and amendments offered to his amendment.

Mr. STEVENSON. Reserving the right to object, which I hardly ever do, I should like to inquire how the time on this side is to be divided. Sometimes some of us disagree with the position of the committee on some matters, and we are not given time. I hardly ever ask for time, but I may want five minutes.

Mr. SIMS. Those who are in favor of the Sweet amendment will get time from the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH]; those opposed to it will get time from myself.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. RAYBURN. That would cut off everybody over here who wants to speak in favor of the amendment.

Mr. SIMS. Not at all.

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] says he has requests for an hour on that side. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] says he is not going to yield to anybody who is supporting the amendment. That will cut off everybody on this side who wants to support the amendment.

Mr. SIMS. When the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] said "this side" I thought he meant the affirmative of the amendment.

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not suppose anybody over here would go to the gentleman from Wisconsin for time.

Mr. ESCH. I said "on this side." If there are others on that side who want to speak in favor of the amendment——

Mr. RAYBURN. A member of the committee wants 10 minutes in favor of it.

Mr. ESCH. In that case we will have to extend the time.

Mr. RAYBURN. If the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] can take care of this side of the House in his one-hour proposition, that is different; but gentlemen on this side who support the amendment do not want to be cut out entirely.

Mr. SIMS. The rule about dividing time is always that those in favor of an amendment are considered together, and those against the amendment are considered together, without regard to which side of the House they may be on.

Mr. TILSON. It seems to me that in a matter of this importance that ought to be the line of demarkation, and then there can be no claim of unfairness in regard to the matter.

Mr. SIMS. That is, that half the time shall be controlled by those who favor the amendment, and half by those who oppose the amendment. That is the only way I know.

Mr. TILSON. It seems that on an important matter like this that ought to be the method of dividing the time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. MADDEN. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. ESCH. May I make a counter proposition, that we may have an hour and a half on a side, to be divided as heretofore, the gentleman from Tennessee controlling one-half the time and myself one-half the time?

Mr. SIMS. That does not settle the question as to dividing the time between those in favor of the amendment and those opposed to it.

Mr. ESCH. I will try to take care of those who favor the amendment, either on that side or this.

The CHAIRMAN. Let the Chair put the proposition. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] asks unanimous consent that the debate upon this amendment and all amendments thereto shall be limited to three hours, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] and one-half by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH]. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I object.

Mr. SIMS. We ought to have an agreement about this matter.

Mr. DOWELL. I suggest that we go ahead with the debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET] is recognized for five minutes in support of his amendment.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, this is the same amendment that I presented to the committee. It is the same amendment that I referred to in my remarks in general debate. This amendment gives to the Interstate Commerce Commission jurisdiction over rates, fares, charges, and classifications of carriers. The amendment also provides that the Interstate Commerce Commission may take into consideration the facts and circumstances in connection with our present war conditions in arriving at what may be a reasonable and just rate. This amendment does not in any way interfere with the President in the control, possession, and operation of the railways. This amendment preserves to the Interstate Commerce Commission its influence and its power. It is a commission that has excelled all other commissions, and in some respects compares favorably with the Supreme Court of the United States. This amendment preserves the integrity of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which has been the product of 30 years of incessant legislative and railway warfare. This amendment gives to the shipper, to the farmer, and to those who may be interested in rate making and in transportation facilities a place to go where their rights may be determined by experienced men who have been appointed to that position because of their education and their training and because they have studied questions of this character.

This amendment recognizes the line of demarkation between war legislation and peace legislation. This amendment means that the railway rates of this country will not be in a jumbled and irregular condition after the war.

This amendment means that all the railroads, whether under private or Government control, will have the same organization—the same commission—passing upon the question of their rates and charges. It does away with the double-barreled affair referred to by the gentleman from Louisiana.

This amendment means that the men before whom the hearing is had, before whom the arguments are made, will render the final decision and make the final recommendations.

This amendment retains the force, power, and stability of the Interstate Commerce Commission and takes it out of the anomalous position of being simply an advisory board—that it will not be simply a debating society, as was well said by the gentleman from Ohio the other day. This amendment does not interfere in any way with raising the rates. The Interstate Commerce Commission can raise rates or lower rates during the period of Federal control; but it means that all rates will be raised or lowered in an orderly, reasonable, just, and considerate manner.

This amendment does not deprive the President of the right and power to initiate rates, because the President when he took over the carriers took the place of the railways as to control, operation, management, and possession. The railways had the right to initiate rates, and he will have the right to initiate rates. If, without any legislation on this subject, the President has the right to initiate and make rates, he still has the right to initiate rates, for this amendment does not deprive him of that right.

Mr. SNOOK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. I prefer not to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. SWEET. The Interstate Commerce Commission will have the same jurisdiction over rates, fares, and charges, and classification of carriers that it had before Government control of railways. I want to impress it upon the House that this amendment retains to the Interstate Commerce Commission all the rights and powers that it had before Government control, but it does not interfere with the President initiating rates. The President can initiate a rate, and the Interstate Commerce Commission goes through the same formalities with reference to the proposed rate that it did when the railroads initiated the rates.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman can get more time. I want to make a motion.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. SIMS. I desire to make a motion to limit debate. Then, as soon as that is done, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET] can proceed.

Mr. SWEET. I do not yield.

Mr. SIMS. I thought the gentleman's time had expired.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired, and the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Tennessee to make his motion.

Mr. SIMS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SIMS. Is it in order to move to close debate and at the same time to provide that the time shall be equally divided?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

Mr. SIMS. I thought that way myself. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa and amendments thereto close in two hours.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that all debate upon this amendment and all amendments thereto close in two hours.

Mr. MADDEN. I wish to offer an amendment to that.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to offer an amendment, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MADDEN. I thought, Mr. Chairman, I was recognized by the Chair to offer an amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MADDEN. I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee by making it four and one-half hours.

Mr. SHERLEY. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SHERLEY. Was the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee to limit debate upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa and all amendments to that amendment, or was it a motion to limit debate on that amendment and all other amendments to the paragraph?

Mr. SIMS. It was only to the amendment and amendments to the amendment.

Mr. SHERLEY. If you are to limit debate on the broad subject, why not limit it to all amendments to the paragraph?

Mr. SIMS. I thought it might be hard to get that. I will modify my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment to the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee that debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto shall be limited to 4 hours and 30 minutes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute, that debate on this amendment and all amendments relative to the rate-making power shall be limited to four and a half hours. My object is to get that one subject disposed of.

Mr. SIMS. That is too much time.

Mr. SHERLEY. The committee can fix the time any way it wants to, but let us do something.

Mr. SIMS. I will ask the gentleman from Kentucky to make it three hours, for his motion puts us into to-morrow.

Mr. MADDEN. It will go into to-morrow anyway.

Mr. SIMS. I will accept the amendment if you make it three hours.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the committee indulge me a moment? The purpose of my amendment was not to fix the time, but the form of the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee was such as after you got through with the debate a Member could offer an original proposition dealing with the rate-making power, and there would be no limitation of debate on that. I want to limit the time and fix debate on the rate-making side of it.

Mr. SIMS. The only reason I did not do that was that I was afraid we could not carry it.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, if I may be indulged a moment. I would be glad to limit debate to three hours if it can be understood that at the end of the debate we will not proceed any further with the legislation to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the Chair understand the gentleman from Tennessee to accept as a part of his original motion the suggestion of the gentleman from Kentucky——

Mr. SIMS. To fix the time at three hours?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Tennessee to accept that part of the suggestion of the gentleman from Kentucky which referred to the language, the question of time then being the only issue left before the committee.

Mr. SIMS If the gentleman from Kentucky will state his suggestion over, so that there will be no mistake.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion of the gentleman from Tennessee stands this way: That all debate upon the amendments proposed by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET] and all amendments bearing on the rate-making question shall be closed in two hours. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] moves to amend that by providing that it shall close in four and one-half hours.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Further along I desire to offer an amendment to page 12, line 9, relative to the jurisdiction of the courts. I wish it to be clearly understood that this motion will not interfere with my offering an amendment upon that subject.

Mr. SIMS. It will not.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion of the gentleman from Tennessee applies only to the rate-making question.

Mr. STAFFORD. A parliamentary inquiry. If the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois is voted down, would it not be in order to offer an amendment making it three hours?

The CHAIRMAN. It would.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I will state that I am perfectly willing to make it three hours instead of two. I now modify my amendment so as to make it three hours to apply to all the rate-making amendments.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I will accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Tennessee and withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois withdraws his amendment without objection, and the gentleman from Tennessee moves that all debate upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET] and upon all amendments relating to the rate-making question shall be closed in three hours.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I thought the Chair was about to put a request for unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. No; it is a motion of the gentleman from Tennessee. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. SIMS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that one half of the three hours in favor of the rate-making amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, or any other rate-making amendments, be controlled by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] and the other half by myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the time which has been agreed upon shall be controlled one half by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH], to be yielded by him as he may see fit to those who are in favor of any rate-making provision other than that contained in the bill, and the other half by himself. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five additional minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET].

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call attention briefly to the paragraph to be stricken out by this amendment. In the first place it refers to the Interstate Commerce Commission having jurisdiction over rates, fares, charges, and classifications of carriers under Federal control. It next refers to the President having authority to initiate rates, fares, charges, and classifications of carriers, and filing the same with the Interstate Commerce Commission. It is then stated that all rates, fares, and charges shall be reasonable and just.

If complaint is made to the Interstate Commerce Commission, it can have full hearings concerning the fairness, justice, and reasonableness of the rates or charges therein ordered by the President. The Interstate Commerce Commission can then report its findings and recommendations to the President for such action as the President may deem required in the public interest. The President can then say to the Interstate Commerce Commission, "Your findings are not reasonable or just, your recommendations are not feasible, and I will adhere to my former decision." Or he can accept the recommendations of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The Interstate Commerce Commission, as you will observe, simply becomes an advisory board. This paragraph in the bill could just as well be condensed into a few lines so as to read as follows: "The President of the United States is authorized and empowered to make all rates, fares, and charges during the period of Federal control." That language, in my judgment, would express the full meaning of this paragraph in the bill.

Sometimes when I read over the language it seems to me that it is a condemnation of the Interstate Commerce Commission. That it says to the commission you are a body of men appointed for a certain work, appointed because you have extraordinary qualifications and experience in passing upon railway rates, fares, and charges. But when it comes to passing upon rates during this crisis in our country's history you have not the ability, the learning, nor the patriotism to render reasonable and just decisions and make impartial recommendations.

It seems to me that it says to the members of this great commission you are incompetent to perform the duties for which you were appointed.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back one-half minute.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MERRITT].

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Chairman, I hope that section 11 of the bill will remain as reported by the majority of the committee. Considering this section purely from an economic point of view, I believe that initial fixing of rates under the power of the President is essential to the success of the plan of railroad control covered by the bill.

And, of course, every patriotic man, especially every man who is opposed to Government ownership, desires to have the plan succeed.

It seems clear that the fundamental reason why the railroads, during the period of the control of their rates by the Interstate Commerce Commission, did not succeed, and in fact were gradually drifting more and more toward a general state of bankruptcy, was that, on the one hand, they were subject to constantly increasing cost of labor and material and constantly increasing hampering regulations, while, on the other hand, they had no power to recoup themselves by increased rates.

Every manufacturing business and every other business, in fixing its rates for the sale of its product, necessarily first considers the cost of the product and then adds a percentage for profit. If the ordinary business concern can not sell its product at a price greater than its cost, then it has two courses open to it, namely, either to sell for a time at a loss or to stop business. But a railroad can under no circumstances stop business.

Now, the only thing the railroad has to sell is transportation; and if, on the one hand, the cost of transportation is fixed by a power outside the railroads, as has been the case, and if, on the other hand, the price at which it sells its transportation is fixed by another and different power, as has been the case, it is quite obvious that the owners and managers of the railroads have no power to conduct their business on the only possible basis on which any successful business can be run.

In pursuance of this principle it appears to me that it is essential to the success of this plan that the President should be given control of the rates. After this bill becomes a law he is the man who will have to do with fixing the price of labor, and, to a large extent, the price of material, which fix the cost of the product of transportation, and if he is going to make a success of the plan he must be the man who, after he ascertains the cost of its product, can fix the price. It needs no argument to show that for every reason, both public and private, he will not fix the price of transportation any higher than he is actually obliged to do by its cost.

It is essential to the success of this plan and to prevent Government ownership that the railroads should succeed and should make a profit during the time when they are run by the President, because otherwise, when the war ceases, if the roads have not been making a profit, and when the time comes to return them, it is quite evident that the price of railroad securities will fall to such an extent as to create a national financial disaster, and, to avoid that, the only recourse would be Government ownership.

In short, the man who will be responsible for the success of this plan is the President, and it always has been and always will be a sound business principle that you can not divorce responsibility and power if you want to hold any man responsible for success, and so I hope the bill, in this particular, will be allowed to stand as it is reported by the majority of the committee. [Applause.]

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. VOIGT].

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET]. I see no good reason for robbing the Interstate Commerce Commission of the power that the commission now has to fix the rates. This bill proposes to put that power into the hands of the President. The President himself has no experience in fixing rates, and if that power is left to him, he will have to delegate the power to some other person or to some commission or board, and very naturally the President would call on the Interstate Commerce Commission. That is the only body that has expert experience on this subject. If you take away from the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to fix the rates you will reduce that body practically to a set of office boys, and I am not in favor of taking away a power that the commission has so well exercised in the past. I hope this amendment will be adopted.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON].

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, considering this proposition, I desire to read the following telegram from the Chicago Association of Commerce, signed by Lucius Teter, president:

CHICAGO, ILL., February 25, 1918.

Hon. WILLIAM E. MASON,
Representative, Washington, D. C.:

Referring to legislation now pending in respect to Federal control of railway transportation, we respectfully suggest if the President or his representative be given authority to initiate rates, rules, regulations, etc., that the same should be filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission, as now provided by the commerce act, and that public notice be given thereof; that upon complaint the commission may enter into a hearing, to be speedily determined, and make recommendations to the President. The President may, however, be authorized to disregard the conclusions of the commission, and by Executive order put such said rates, fares, or charges into effect if in his judgment such action is necessary during the period of the war.

THE CHICAGO ASSOCIATION OF COMMERCE,
By LUCIUS TETER, President.

The activities of the service rendered by this great association are the reasons why I have placed this in the RECORD, that we may have the benefit of their advice in this matter.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT].

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, this bill defining the terms of the control and operation of the railroads of the United States by the National Government, the agreement to be made with their owners for compensation, and so forth, during the period of the war, is one of the most important measures that has ever come before the Congress. It confers very great powers upon the President, as have the food control and other war measures already on the statute books, but it seems to me that the great powers are necessary, and I am opposed to the amendment which would strike from the bill the President's power of initiating and of determining rates. Much has been said on both sides of this question, and I am sorry to differ in this matter from the majority of the minority members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, who have done such good work in preparing the bill, but it is not a party question in any sense. The argument that the power of making rates should be lodged with the same authority that has control of the expenses of operation seems to me stronger than any argument made in favor of leaving the rate making wholly with the Interstate Commerce Commission. It may be necessary for the most efficient conduct of the war to promulgate rates with regard to some particular commodities or some particular territory promptly, and the Interstate Commerce Commission is constitutionally and traditionally incapable of acting quickly. It always wants to investigate and investigate for what seems an interminable period before acting, and in time of war it is often necessary to act first and investigate afterwards. I am not afraid to trust the President with this great power, because railroad rates are governed in the main by economic principles which can not be very much departed from without disaster, and because the Interstate Commerce Commission remains, according to the terms of the bill, as a check upon the President's power, charged with the making of investigations and reports upon any complaints.

I freely admit that my opposition to this amendment is to some extent due to a feeling and conviction that has been forming for some time that the Interstate Commerce Commission has fallen into a rut in the matter of regulating railroad rates from which it seems impossible that it can free itself even at the imperative call of war. Railroad rates are an exceedingly technical matter, but it seems clear to me that the commission has disregarded certain economic principles and has failed to deal with the matter along broad lines; has failed to allow rates to respond to great economic changes such as general increases or decreases of prices, and therefore by holding them practically rigid through a period of increased prices, prices due in some measure to inflation, has decreased the purchasing power of the railroads beyond reason, and has prevented them from preparing for the emergency which is upon us. Perhaps I can not do better than to read a letter which I wrote during the very serious crisis of a few weeks ago in the matter of supplying coal to the people. It is an extreme statement, and I admit not wholly just, and after writing it to relieve my feelings I laid it aside and did not mail it, but in the main I think the criticism merited:

To the INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: Why can't a little common sense be used in dealing with the railroads, now that they have been placed above the hampering restrictions of antiquated State and National laws by Government operation? Why can they not be dealt with in accordance with universally recognized economic principles? With the demand for transportation taxing every eastern line to the breaking point, why are not rates raised? Why were they not raised before the condition became acute, for the purpose of checking the demand for the transportation for non-essentials?

The treatment of the rate question as a whole for several years, from the standpoint of the student of economics, can only be described as idiotic. You have considered everything in determining the general level of rates but the matters which alone should have governed. You have lowered rates when demand for transportation was greatest and when all prices were high, and you have increased rates when prices were falling and when demand for transportation was declining. In general treatment of the question you have left undone the things that you ought to have done, and have done the things that you ought not to have done, and there is no business common sense in you. You have devoted yourselves to the tithing of mint, anise, and cummin, like the Pharisees of old, to the neglect of the weightier matters of the law.

At the present time in the passenger service efforts are being made to prevent people from traveling by every mean device imaginable and without using the one common-sense plan of raising the rates. Trains are taken off so that those remaining will be overcrowded and made as uncomfortable as possible. Every convenience and comfort has been removed, but still the rates remain so low that crowds of excursionists continue to come to Washington purely for pleasure, congesting beyond safety the already overtaxed hotel and living accommodations of the city.

The present plight of the railroads, including the coal famine, with its serious hardships, sickness, and deaths, are chargeable in some measure to you, and to-day it is a debatable question whether the Nation would not be better off and better fitted to cope with the tremendous problems that confront us if the Interstate Commerce Commission had never been given any power over rates beyond the abolition of unfair discrimination between persons or places.

Yours, very truly, ——— ———.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. PLATT. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BARNHART. The gentleman did not intentionally omit charging the epidemic of measles now prevailing to the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. PLATT. Oh, there were a few things I thought I could not fairly charge them with. I admit that the letter is not wholly just. It is an extreme statement.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, I take it that the Interstate Commerce Commission has no power to commit anyone for contempt.

Mr. PLATT. I am sorry for that.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, is not the crux of the gentleman's contention, favoring the Presidents' initiation of rates in preference to the Interstate Commerce Commission, in which I agree with him, the fact that the President will arrange the rates and will expedite the adjustment of the rates without unnecessary delay, and also give a wider latitude and greater field from which to ascertain what are correct rates? As I understand it, whatever rates are initiated they are subject to review by the courts and are not absolutely fixed until a court has rendered a decision.

Mr. PLATT. That is about it.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PLATT. Certainly.

Mr. GORDON. There is a provision in the bill which limits the President to fixing a rate that is just and reasonable, just as it limits the Interstate Commerce Commission. Would the gentleman strike that out?

Mr. PLATT. I would not, but I think the President could still judge as to whether the rates are just or reasonable; and if he wants to fix a rate for the purpose of shutting off certain traffic, he can do it, in my opinion.

Mr. GORDON. Then the gentleman's point is that the President will fix rates without evidence, while the Interstate Commerce Commission will follow the law and fix them from the evidence. That is the gentleman's complaint?

Mr. PLATT. If the President has the common sense I think he has, that is exactly what he will do.

Mr. GORDON. Disregard the evidence?

Mr. PLATT. Fix the rates on broad general evidence, and let the Interstate Commerce Commission do the technical investigating afterwards.

Mr. GORDON. They have no power except to investigate.

Mr. PLATT. That is all they need.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. I will.

Mr. DENISON. I would like to ask the gentleman why the Interstate Commerce Commission could not do that as well as the President.

Mr. PLATT. Because it would take them a year to do it, and it may be necessary to get the rates fixed right away. The Interstate Commerce Commission is constitutionally unable to act promptly.

Mr. DENISON. Why does the gentleman assume that the Interstate Commerce Commission will not recognize conditions?

Mr. PLATT. Because they have had conditions thrust upon them time and time again and have not recognized them.

As I have said, this letter expresses an extreme view and is not wholly fair to the commission. Nobody can read the reports of the commission without realizing that it does a great deal of very good work. Railroad rates present an exceedingly complicated fabric, which there are reasons for disturbing as little as possible, as one change generally involves a lot of others, but the very fact that the commission does much good work in investigating and determining the fairness or unfairness of rates in individual cases, or in certain territory, makes it apparently unable to handle with promptness enough to do any good questions of broader aspect. It did great harm in allowing the purchasing power of the railroads to decline to the point where many of them were not able to finance needed additions to equipment or needed betterments. It was in some measure due to this fact that the railroads had to be taken over by the Government, though undoubtedly the main reason was the absolute necessity of obtaining freedom from the restrictions of the antitrust laws of State and Nation, so that freight and earnings could be pooled. These laws had to be broken, and the President was the only person who could be given power to break them. He is operating the roads, through the Director of Railroads, and I see no reason for withholding from him the power of determining their income by fixing rates. I feel sure that he will so handle the matter that there will be no deficits and no resort to general taxation of the people for the support of the railroads. [Applause.]

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. SIMS. How much does the gentleman yield back?

The CHAIRMAN. Three minutes.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL].

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, probably all that will remain of 30 years of legislation on interstate commerce at the close of this war will be the Interstate Commerce Commission. I do not believe, therefore, this is a good time to take from that commission any of the powers or responsibilities that have been from year to year and from one growth of legislation to another reposed in that great commission. Every rate they agree to must square with the law and must be just and reasonable. You can not arrive at a just and reasonable rate with a hop, skip, and jump. Even the President of the United States or the Director General of Railways can not do that. No man, no bureau, commission, or other creation of the law is so well qualified to fix railway rates as the Interstate Commerce Commission. Its members were appointed for their fitness and for their ability with respect to this particular work. There never was a time when just and reasonable rates were more essential than now while we are undergoing this transition with the facilities of interstate commerce, and to impose the responsibility upon the President of making rates is to impose upon him a thing that he can not do and do according to the law—make them just and reasonable. His rates would be a guess. Every man who has argued for the making of rates by the President says they must be made quickly, that they must be done immediately. The power to initiate rates rests with the President under his power of control of the railroads. The railroads now have the power to initiate rates and file schedules with the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the President has that power. It is said, Why not permit the President to make the rate? You permit the body that he creates to make it. But he does not create the Interstate Commerce Commission. That is the creation of Congress. But if it is argued that the President would expect the Interstate Commerce Commission to agree to the rates that he suggested, the reverse of that proposition will well be true. If the President files according to law, as he has a right to now, or the Director of Railways, rates with the Interstate Commerce Commission, if they are just and reasonable, the rates will be made the rates for the railroad and upon the commodity.

Mr. BLACK rose.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No; I can not yield. Mr. Chairman, I dislike the tendency of these times to dump everything on the President. We are passing too much responsibility to and imposing too many duties upon the President of the United States. Congress can not and ought not to abdicate. We have some responsibilities left, and we ought not to delegate to a single individual in an hour that which has taken us 30 years to delegate to the Interstate Commerce Commission—the rate-making power.

There is no greater power reposed in any body except the Supreme Court of the United States than in the Interstate Commerce Commission, that of finally settling upon a just and reasonable rate upon the railways and upon the common carriers of the country. The shippers of the country, I take it, without very much dissention would rather have the rates fixed, high or low, by the Interstate Commerce Commission than any one individual. The country has confidence in the President and in the Director General of Railways, but no one will go so far as to say that the Interstate Commerce Commission can not better arrive at a just and reasonable rate than either the President of the United States or the Director General of Railways. The President is much absorbed with other and with great matters. The Director General of Railways is not only clothed with duties and responsibilities with respect to railways but he is the Secretary of the Treasury, and has many duties and responsibilities aside from that, and to add to these duties, multitudinous as they are, the additional duty of finding a just and reasonable rate upon the traffic that is carried in the interstate commerce of the country, would be imposing too great a responsibility and power upon them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY].

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I will attempt to pass by and not for a second time deal with questions that have been already discussed when the bill was under general debate. It was well said by the gentleman from Kentucky that the President stepped into the footsteps of the carrier and that on that account he has the right to initiate rates, and we come then to the single question, whether rates made by him shall be absolute or shall be subject to be set aside by the Interstate Commerce Commission. That is the question that is presented here. It was presented in the Senate and it is presented again here in the bill which we are now considering. We have lost sight, so far as the discussion has gone, of one thing which, it seems to me, is vitally important and controlling, and that is this bill provides that a rate shall be fair, just, and reasonable. Now, if we have the right to make such legislation as that, if we have the right to pass such an enactment, when passed it means exactly what the words purport. It means that the rates must be fair, must be just, must be reasonable, and must not be discriminatory between different shippers. Now, that being so, the general impression here from this debate has been that when you allow the Interstate Commerce Commission to act simply in an advisory capacity you have taken away the right of review.

That is not true at all. You have shifted the right of review, but that right remains and can not be taken away. The courts still have the right to insist that the rate shall be just, shall be fair, shall be reasonable, and shall not be discriminatory. And the only difference is this, that, instead of waiting in these war times, instead of waiting when you are changing your whole system of transportation, instead of waiting when you are unifying and consolidating the various lines of transportation and making them a unified whole, instead of operating them as you have heretofore, as separate and competing systems, at a time when you are making that momentous and vast change, you shall not wait to investigate in each case, to take testimony, to hesitate and defer as to what a rate shall be, but you put the rate into effect at once, and then the shipper has the right to appeal to the courts, and, if the rate is not fair, if it is not just, if it is not reasonable, it has the right to set it aside; if the rate is discriminatory, it has the right to set it aside.

Mr. DEWALT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. The argument the gentleman is pursuing is clearly logical, from the fact that the bill proposed does not contain the words to fix rates. He has no need to initiate rates. Therefore he can not absolutely fix them. They are subject to review.

Mr. DEMPSEY. And if we were providing that the President could make a rate which shall be fixed and unalterable we would use the word "make," but we would not use the word "initiate."

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman permit a question there?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. If he can not fix them, but merely initiate them, and under this bill the Interstate Commerce Commission can not fix them, then who can? That is a question I would like to have settled.

Mr. DEMPSEY. He has the right to make rates subject to review by the court. He would have had the right previous to the enactment of this law to make rates subject to review by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. STEVENSON. Then the gentleman contends——

Mr. DEMPSEY. Wait one moment. You simply shift it. In one case it is the Interstate Commerce Commission, and in this case it is the court. And you shift it in another sense. To adapt yourself to the exigencies of the time, to enable you to make new rates in a wholesale way, as will be necessary, owing to the fact, as I say, that you have now consolidated and united all the systems and made them a unified whole, instead of competing units—in order to adapt yourself to these new conditions it is necessary that rates should be made quickly, rates should be made at once, rates should be made to meet these new conditions. And, then, you have a right. What right is it? It is the right to review those rates. It is a sacred right, and it is protected by this act. It is the right the shipper has to appeal to any court. Is not that infinitely better than a review by the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Let me refer for one moment to what is said by Senator CUMMINS and by Senator POINDEXTER. Perhaps there is no man more eminent in the country than Senator CUMMINS upon this question. He says this right of review which is asked here by the Interstate Commerce Commission would be futile. Here is what he says about it:

> Anyone who is familiar with the subject must know that if the President is given authority to establish rates and put them into immediate effect, subject only to review by the Commission upon complaint, the review is of little practical value.

And I turn to Senator POINDEXTER, who goes still further. He says:

> It is a little too much to expect of human nature that officials who owe their official existence to the President will be able, however much they may try, to exercise any real independent judgment or action in setting aside the President's orders in the matter of rates. * * * To provide that a commission appointed by the President may set aside the rates made by the President is wholly illogical and will be unworkable in practical application.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. If the gentlemen will wait just one moment, until I finish this, then I will yield.

Now, gentlemen, which would you rather have, the right to appeal to a commission, as Senator CUMMINS and as Senator POINDEXTER both point out, composed of the appointees of the President, or would you rather have the right to appeal to the courts wherever you wish throughout this broad land of ours; to appeal to men who may have been appointed 20 years ago, men who have the independence of the judiciary, not men who are simply holding places as commissioners?

Mr. GORDON. Who appointed the court?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Who appointed it?

Mr. GORDON. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Perhaps Mr Taft, perhaps Mr. Roosevelt, and perhaps back of that, Mr. McKinley. They hold positions for life. They do not hold them for a short tenure or at the whim of any President. They hold them during good behavior, and they will be on their good behavior here just as much as they will be at any other time.

Gentlemen, the right which you seek by this amendment is a right which has no value. You are getting more in the bill than is proposed. You are getting a greater right and a more valuable one. And, more than that, we are putting these railroads into the hands of the President.

Now, I want to say a word to you gentlemen on the Republican side, who call yourselves the conservatives of this body. Will you say to the President, "You may have all the rights here to incur obligations by the Government, to plunge the country into debt, but you can not have the right to establish rates sufficient to keep these railroads out of bankruptcy?" Are you going to bring about a condition where you are going to force Government ownership by the fact that the roads will become insolvent through the inability to fix quickly and expeditiously the necessary rates?

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. Now, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. And I say to you, gentlemen on the other side, that you have trusted your President in all other things, and now are you going to deny him this power? Are you going to say to him, that you will put these roads in his hands, that you will charge him with their betterment, you will charge him with their upkeep, you will charge him with everything that can be charged with ownership, and then deny him the only right to raise the needed revenue?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I will state to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] that he is now entitled to use 10 minutes.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, under no conceivable conditions, under no possible combination of circumstances, can it be or become necessary or essential to clothe the President with the power to fix railroad rates in order to enable him to successfully conduct or win the war. That being true, I am at a loss to understand how anyone should desire to place upon the shoulders of an already overworked and overburdened Executive this enormous and dangerous power.

As the outcome of years of contest and controversy, political and legislative, the Congress placed in the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission the tremendously important, intricate, and perplexing question of determining whether under all the circumstances and conditions a given rate was fair and just. That commission, in the discharge of the duties thus laid upon it, has commended itself and its decisions to the good sense and sound judgment of the American people to an extent almost unparalleled in the history of administrative or judicial tribunals.

Is this new departure in rate making proposed on the theory that the President may be prevailed upon or persuaded to approve a general advance of railroad rates which the Interstate Commerce Commission would not recommend or approve——

Mr. GORDON. And has refused.

Mr. MONDELL. And has refused? If that is the thought lying back of this proposal, then the sooner we scotch it the better. Some advances may be necessary. Few should be necessary if we are to have the benefits we expect from unified and coordinated Federal control. The rates should be high enough to pay operating expenses, make needed repairs, and provide funds to meet the guaranteed return. Any advance of rates above that is a new and novel and entirely unjustified form of taxation.

Mr. GORDON. And unlawful, too.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; and unlawful taxation, which no one can defend.

Is it the thought of some that under this power the President may be persuaded to suggest and propose and carry out a general reduction of rates, without regard to the necessary revenues? If that is the thought underlying this proposed grant of authority it is a tremendously dangerous one, having no purpose except a purely political one, that of making the Government management of the roads appear favorable to the shipper; that of making Government management and control pleasing and satisfactory to those who desire its continuance without regard to its actual advantages. Nothing would be more harmful to the interests of the public than the lifting from the shoulders of the shippers the payment of their just burdens and laying them upon the shoulders of the taxpayer. To sum up, this is the situation:

The authority to fix railroad rates would not be helpful and is not necessary to the prosecution or winning of the war, and therefore should not be added to the present burdens of the President.

The Interstate Commerce Commission now has and is exercising that authority, subject to review by the courts. It has performed that duty to the general satisfaction of the majority of the people and should retain the authority it has been exercising

To place this great responsibility, not necessary to the successful prosecution of the war, upon the shoulders of the President is to invite the dangers that arise out of autocratic power for no good reason or purpose. In my opinion, such a proposal should meet the opposition of every friend of the President, and everyone sincerely anxious for the successful operation of the railroads under Government control. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, all over the country those interested in increasing the profits of railways and raising the price of railway stocks and bonds have raised their voices in notes of glee over the prospect that through and by this bill the Interstate Commerce Commission is to be deprived of the power of fixing rates. I am not surprised at this, but I am surprised at the boldness with which they have expressed these views in the public press.

Something more than 30 years ago, I think it was, when the Interstate Commerce Commission was established to stand between the people and the arbitrary power which the railroads then possessed of fixing any rate which they chose, which they commonly fixed at "all the traffic would bear." The establishment of this commission was bitterly opposed by the railroads. They fought its creation by every means in their power, legitimate, and illegitimate. Where they could buy legislators, cases which I am happy to say were few, they bought them. Where they could bully or frighten them, they attacked them. Where they could defeat them for election, they used all their powers for that purpose. Fortunately for this country, the honor and integrity of Congress and its ability to solve great problems were successfully maintained. The establishment of the Interstate Commerce Commission was an epoch-making act and one of the greatest glories of a long line of Republican administrations. Ever since this commission was created the railroads have been trying to get rid of it by fair means or foul, but without the slightest prospect of success until they were able to conceal their design and purpose under the cover of this bill.

If this bill is passed as it stands, it absolutely eliminates the Interstate Commerce Commission during the period of the war, and the real purpose of the paragraph under consideration is to enter a wedge which ultimately will entirely drive the Interstate Commerce Commission from existence. The amendment offered by my colleague [Mr. SWEET] ought by all means to be made. If the bill is left in its present form it undoes the work of years and leads us backward instead of forward. I can not understand how anyone but the most reactionary can favor its present form. The amendment offered by my colleague simply keeps the law as it is and merely preserves to the commission the powers which it now possesses. During all the years that they have acted, nobody has ever had to such an extent the support of the people at large, and especially those who must in the end pay the compensation of the railways—the shippers and the traveling public. Time and time again it has protected them from unjust and unreasonable, even from outrageous and extortionate rates. No high court in all our broad land has ever so enjoyed the confidence of our citizens. There never has been a whisper against the integrity of any member. There never has been an intimation that it was unfair, and never has it been charged that it has been biased or prejudiced except by those who are seeking to obtain an unreasonable advantage through which they could pay high dividends upon watered stocks and upon bonds and obligations created without any fair consideration being received therefor. I need not repeat here the story of the looting of the New Haven, the Frisco, the Pere Marquette, the Dayton, the Louisville & Nashville, and other roads, nor even that of the Rock Island, with which I am so familiar, having uncovered the evidence which supported the resolution which I had introduced for its investigation, and also because I assisted in the investigation itself. The history of these roads ought to be and probably is familiar to you all. You know the slimy trail of graft which the officials who wrecked these roads left behind them. All these investigations were conducted by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and while the exposures did not bring back the money stolen they made it impossible to repeat the same kind of robbery. I say now that the Interstate Commerce Commission alone stands between the people and a repetition of those palmy days for railroad magnates when the motto was, "The public be ——," and "charge all the traffic can bear."

The amendment proposed by the Senate will not, in my judgment, help the situation in the least. It provides that the President shall initiate rates and that the Interstate Commerce Commission may review them, but as the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY], quoting, in substance, from the report of Senator CUMMINS, asked, "Who is expecting the commissioners, appointed by the President and depending upon him for their positions in office, to overrule his findings?" As he is not satisfied with the Interstate Commerce Commission, the gentleman from New York apparently views the Senate amendment with favor. I am opposed to it for the very reasons that he stated, that in effect it would make the Interstate Commerce Commission merely a rubber stamp to ratify the findings of the President.

For many years the Interstate Commerce Commsision seemed so firmly established that it was useless to openly oppose it. Then the railroads took another turn to stealthily and craftily destroy it. They succeeded in getting a commerce court established with power to overrule its decisions, the court, which I may say, had for its members some judges whose conduct was so notorious as to compel this Congress to impeach and revoke. It lasted but a few years when such a storm of indignation arose against it that it was abolished by a bill passed by so large a majority in Congress as to overrule a presidential veto. I thought then that we would never again hear of any attempt to abolish the Interstate Commerce Commission, but I was mistaken. The railroads took another plan. It was to continually attack it through the newspapers and by insidious means impugn the action of the commission with reference to rates. For several years this propaganda has been financed and carried on by the railroads. The Interstate Commerce Commission had no way of protecting itself from the unjust attacks that had been made upon it. Nothing ever appeared in the great papers of the country which was favorable to its action. Somehow and some way, no matter what it did, it was criticized, even though it raised rates, as it did repeatedly. Everywhere one could see paragraphs to the effect that it had always denied a raise to the railroads and that it was prejudiced against them.

Absurd as this contention was, it seems to have had its effect upon many. Assert a proposition often enough, and no matter how false it may be, if it is not denied, many will come to believe in it, and the Interstate Commerce Commission had no one to present the case on their behalf. It controlled no newspapers. It had no financial connections, while its opponents had every owner of railroad stocks and every great financial institution that possessed them against it.

Nothing was further from the truth than this charge. There were no influences which surrounded the commission which could influence it against the railways. If anything, the tendency was to lead them in the opposite direction. It was impossible that they should have any motive in failing to decide as the railway officials desired. They have not been subject to elections. On the contrary, they have always been appointed by Presidents who were never suspected, much less accused, of being unfriendly to the railways. The real difficulty was that the demands of the railways were so exorbitant and unreasonable that no men of character, ability, and reputation could be found who would sanction them. To anyone who claims that the commission has been unfair to the railroads I say read the evidence taken in the Fifteen Per Cent cases and other cases heard by the commission.

I do not mean to intimate that every person who imagines that the Interstate Commerce Commission is prejudiced against the railroads is himself prejudiced in their favor. The fact is that this railway propaganda against the Interstate Commerce Commission has been carried on to such an extent that a large proportion of our community have been completely misled and deceived by it. They have been led to believe that the railroads were doing poorly; that they were losing money; that they were unable to maintain their lines in proper condition; that their credit was bad; that money could not be obtained for railways when it could be obtained for other purposes. Not one of these statements so often repeated are true. Railways never made so much money as they did during the fiscal years of 1916 and 1917—the two years ending June 30, 1917, the last for which we have any complete reports. In each of these years their operating income was over a billion of dollars. By operating income I mean the profit left after paying all expenses of operating and keeping up the roads. This is far larger than it had ever been before and almost three times what it was in 1890. It resulted in many roads piling up an enormous surplus—I could easily name four or five each with a surplus of over a hundred million dollars, much of which could have been used, if they so desired, for maintenance purposes. It was sufficient to pay 6½ per cent on all of the capital that had ever been invested in railways, including the millions that had been stolen from them. Even roads like the Rock Island, unfortunate victims of stock-jobbing pirates whom even the Wall Street Journal said ought to have been wearing stripes—these roads have been making a good profit.

Of course, there were roads like the New Haven, which had been so completely loaded down with stocks and bonds of other corporations sold to it at fictitious values by unscrupulous profiteers, that although the operation of the road paid splendidly, it has been difficult to find money to pay dividends upon all of the vast sums which were added to its liabilities without any return being received therefor. Then there are other roads, like the Trinity and Brazos, which never ought to have been built and by no possibility can ever be made to pay. Raising rates would do them no good, as it would simply drive away what little traffic they now have. On the whole the railroads have had of late a period of remarkable prosperity. In the last 20 years there is nothing to compare with 1916 and 1917. Never have they received as good returns or been as able to pay good dividends; never was their surplus so large.

But it is said that railway credit is poor, and as an example it is said that railway stocks and bonds have greatly fallen, and that it is difficult for the railways to obtain needed funds. All this is true, but I would like to inquire of what business it is not true where funds are needed in large amounts. As to bonds, there is no bond market. It has been entirely absorbed by the Government issues. Bond house after bond house in the city of New York has either closed its doors or discharged most of its salesmen because there was nothing for them to do. Railway bonds have depreciated, but no more than other bonds—no more, in fact, than Government bonds and municipal bonds, all of which have fallen greatly. And where is the concern, except some "war babies" that are making exorbitant profits of from 50 to 100 per cent, that does not find difficulty in obtaining funds at the present time. The Ways and Means Committee were told that a very large public utility, unquestionably solvent, which has for many years shown good profits and paid good dividends, was compelled to pay 13½ per cent for money in New York within the last few weeks. This gigantic war, which has absorbed sums so prodigious as to even stagger the imagination, has produced such a demand for money that we have found it necessary to create a Government-controlled corporation, which is expected to supply funds, if necessary, to the amount of $4,000,000,000 to relieve the strain.

I do not contend that no provision should be made to meet the pressing maturities of the obligations of the railroads. The war has destroyed the free and open market for their securities. The Government has absorbed all the available funds which usually seek this market and left none for them, unless it be some held by unscrupulous profiteers, who, seeking to take advantage of war's necessities, are demanding rates which no legitimate business can pay and live. We must and will take care of them, but not by unreasonable fares and rates which penalize part of the people and unduly burdens all. For this purpose we have provided $500,000,000 in this bill, and expecting soon to pass a bill creating a war finance corporation, for which the Government will furnish another $500,000,000 as capital, authorized to issue $4,000,000 in bonds. This corporation will furnish a means of borrowing the necessary funds. Of course this must be repaid, as it should be, and as much of it can easily be paid from the hundreds of millions of surplus which the more profitable roads have accumulated.

But various speakers on the bill have said, "Are you unwilling to trust the President to make these rates?"

I can not understand how any man who has ever made any study of the subject can suppose for a moment that the President is going to make these rates. There is no science under the sun, I care not what it is, that is so highly technical as that of making rates. The change of a single rate may, and often does, require the change of a hundred and sometimes a thousand others. Yet you hear gentlemen state that the President, without any investigation, without considering the matter particularly, is going to make these rates and fix them.

I say the President will not make these rates. He can not make these rates. If he did, he would do nothing else. They will be made by some other body or by some other persons whom he may select other than the Interstate Commerce Commission—somebody or some persons whom the railways at this time evidently believe will make the rates higher than they are now. And what reason is given for this astonishing proposition? Is it necessary to carry on the war? What has a rate to do with carrying on the war when the President can order a train to pass over a road at any time he desires regardless of what the rate may be? Who can stop the movement of munitions or, indeed, any material that the President considers necessary to pass over a road for the purposes of the war, or who can say where they shall go differently from what he directs?

No, gentlemen, this is not for that purpose. It is not for the purpose of enabling the war to be more vigorously carried on. This provision is not here for the purpose of adding to the efficiency of our preparations. It is here because the railways of the country think they will get some higher rates by reason of it, and it will do away with the Interstate Commerce Commission—at least for the period of the war, after which they hope to have it finally dispensed with.

So much do I desire to use every resource possible to win the war; so unwilling am I to in the least hamper or restrain the President in any way which could in the least prevent him from using all our resources to bring the war to a successful conclusion, that I would favor the bill as it stands even though it inflicted hardship on many and burdens on all, if this provision contributed in the least degree to our ultimate victory. But it does not and can not. I therefore feel constrained to vote for the amendment offered by my colleague [Mr. SWEET] and hope it will prevail. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SIMS. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL].

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I think the provision in the bill which authorizes the President to initiate and to reach a final conclusion regarding rates is the wiser legislation. The record of the Interstate Commerce Commission offers no commendation that it will meet this emergency. The conditions which brought about the necessity for the Government taking over the operation of the railroads, as I interpret them, were due in part to legislation by Congress and to inertia or cowardice upon the part of the Interstate Commerce Commission. We have seen burdens placed upon the railroads which increased their operating expenses, and the Interstate Commerce Commission has failed to provide a remedy by permitting them to charge higher rates.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Just for a question.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman desires the President to have the power, then, on the theory that there will be a general advance in rates under his direction?

Mr. SMALL. I am not afraid to meet that question, and I will do so directly. In the face of these conditions the Interstate Commerce Commission declined to grant increased rates. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] a while ago spoke of our duty to provide a sufficient rate to pay operating expenses, to pay fixed charges, and to leave a reasonable dividend for the capital invested. In that proposition he is right as far as he goes; but I may add one other factor, and that is enough to provide a surplus for facilities in the way of terminals and engines and rolling stock for the purpose of meeting an emergency or congestion of traffic such as has arisen during this war. This emergency, which caused the taking over of the railroads, has been the product of a combination of action and inaction of Congress and inertia by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and we have no reason to hope or believe that the majority of the Interstate Commerce Commission are equal to the present emergency. The railroads must have increased revenues. If that means the raising of rates in order to enable the railroads to provide for the public the facilities which the public are entitled to have, then I stand in favor of raising railroad rates. The railroads constitute the chief instrumentalities of transportation. They are the servants of the public, and they must have the facilities and the income with which to serve the public if they are to do so adequately

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at that point for a brief question?

Mr. SMALL. I have another thought which I wish to develop, but I will yield for a question.

Mr. GORDON. There is simply this provision in the bill which restricts the power of the President, to the fixing of a rate that is just and reasonable, which is the law now. Are you in favor of retaining that in the bill?

Mr. SMALL. I am in favor of the section just as it stands. Now, Mr. Chairman, there is another reason why I am opposed to this amendment. This bill seeks to add to the facilities of transportation—water transportation. We are appreciating today the lack of facilities for water transportation. If we had now upon the Mississippi River and its great tributaries water transportation, if we had upon these thousands of miles of rivers along the Atlantic seaboard and the Gulf and the Pacific the water movement which ought to exist, if we had, for instance, along the Atlantic seaboard a safe, inside route connecting these 10,000 miles of navigable rivers with each other, equipped with boats for water transportation, we would not be confronted to-day with this congestion of traffic.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield at this point?

Mr. SMALL. I am afraid I can not just now. I will develop this thought, and then I will be glad to yield. We realize that there are some essentials for the development of transportation, that there must be water terminals, that there must be transportation lines, that there must be interchange of traffic between water lines and the railroad. The River and Harbor Committee are striving with constructive work and legislation to bring about these conditions. When they are provided there will still remain one obstacle to the development of water transportation, and that obstacle is the fact that there exist railroad rates competitive with water rates in many sections of the country which in years past were reduced so low that it is unprofitable to endeavor to operate water lines.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. In just a moment I will. Wherever those railroad rates are so low as to prevent water competition, they must be advanced and readjusted. [Applause.] I see no economic reason why a railroad rate competitive with water should be any lower than an interior rate. But that is not all. Not only have the railroad rates competitive with water been reduced to this abnormally low point, but interior rates by rail have remained the same, and not only remained on a parity but have actually increased, so that interior sections have been penalized.

Mr. MONDELL. Now will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. I can not just at this minute. In that lies the crux of some of the opposition to river and harbor legislation and appropriations for interior rivers. I do not blame the man from an interior section who opposes an appropriation for an interior river, the only effect of which is to give lower rail rates competitive with that river, and produce no water transportation upon the river. It is an unjustifiable appropriation of the public moneys.

Mr. MONDELL. Now will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. If the gentleman will be brief.

Mr. MONDELL. Would the gentleman have the shippers of the country generally, through an increase of rates, pay for the development of river and canal transportation?

Mr. SMALL. No; but I would equalize the rates, and I would remove the burden of discrimination from the shippers of the interior sections. Now, when the canal bill was passed in 1912 it contained a provision forbidding railroads to increase their rates competitive with water lines except with the assent of the Interstate Commerce Commission. We thought we had enacted a wise piece of legislation. But have we? Since 1912 not a railroad has applied to the Interstate Commerce Commission to have those water competitive rates increased, and they never will apply, because those rates were originally reduced for the purpose of driving out water transportation, and some railroad managers are not yet wise enough to regard water lines as coordinating instrumentalities of transportation and not competitors.

Under that legislation we will never have any readjustment, and we can not have readjustment without some further legislation. One reason why I favor this bill is because the President will under it have the power to increase railroad rates competitive with water lines. This will result in the establishment of water lines and enable them to operate with assurance of a reasonable profit. This result will be ample justification, but another public benefit will ensue. There will be established joint traffic rates and interchange of traffic between the water carriers and the rail carriers, thus making the interior sections sharers in the benefits of cheap water transportation. [Applause.]

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK].

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I am sure that we have all listened with interest to the argument of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] on the amendment that we are now considering, but I dissent from some of the arguments which they have made. For instance, the gentleman from New York takes the position that it would place the Interstate Commerce Commission in an embarrassing attitude to make a decision as to the justice and reasonableness of a rate which the President had initiated, because of the fact that the President is the appointing power of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The gentleman went so far as to argue that the Interstate Commerce Commission is the creature of the President; at least that was the effect of his argument, as I understood it. Why, if I understand the situation at all the Interstate Commerce Commission is a creature of the Congress of the United States, and the President appoints the membership of that commission just as he appoints the membership to the United States Supreme Court, and, like the judges of the Supreme Court, the appointment of the members of the commission is confirmed by the Senate.

I understand further that the matter of judging as to the reasonableness of rates is not an executive function. The President of the United States is an executive officer and vested with executive powers by the Constitution, and that same Constitution says that Congress shall have the power to regulate interstate commerce, and that is where Congress gets its power to prescribe just and reasonable rates, which it does through the Interstate Commerce Commission. The matter of making rates is a legislative function, and for very proper reasons it has been delegated to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and it is certainly an erroneous statement to say that the commission is a creature of the President.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. I will.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Is not there this important difference in the manner of the appointment of the Interstate Commerce Commission and of the members of the Supreme Court—that the latter august body is appointed for life while the members of the Interstate Commerce Commission have only a limited tenure?

Mr. BLACK. I do not think that affects the question at all. The tenure of office is fixed by law and not by the President.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Men are human and men, as a rule, like continuance in power.

Mr. BLACK. I will say to the gentleman that that seems to me to be an irrelevant inquiry.

Mr. RAYBURN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. RAYBURN. Does not the gentleman think it is a reflection on the President of the United States to say that he would appoint an Interstate Commerce Commission who would act according to the policy of the Government in these matters?

Mr. BLACK. Why, yes; and, as I said a moment ago, the matter of fixing rates is not an executive function, and while the Interstate Commerce Commission is an administrative body, it is an administrative body with regulatory powers, and these powers are such as have been vested in it by the act of 1887 and other acts amendatory thereto, enacted by Congress under the Constitution of the United States, and it gets none of its jurisdiction from the executive powers of the President.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. Does the gentleman believe that the President of the United States in time of war should go to the Interstate Commerce Commission and state that he believes that this rate is necessary as a matter of military efficiency, and that the commission itself then would refuse to adopt the rate or approve it and put up their judgment as to what military necessities required against the Commander in Chief?

Mr. BLACK. I will say that I think the Interstate Commerce Commission would give most respectful consideration and the greatest weight to any rate that might be initiated by the President. I favor and approve the provisions in the bill, which has already passed the Senate, which permits the President to initiate the rate subject to the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission upon complaint of the shipper to inquire and review the justness and reasonableness of the rate, and after it has taken the testimony, and otherwise fully reviewed the information on the subject, let it determine as to the justness and reasonableness of the rate. [Applause.]

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE].

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, it is doubtful at this stage of the debate whether anyone can contribute any information on the subject that has now been discussed for nearly a week. It may be that some additional emphasis may be made upon some particular point, but it seems to me that pretty much the whole ground on the subject has been covered.

I was interested in the remarks of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL], who reminded me of my old friend of years ago, Mr. Dick, in David Copperfield, that unfortunate gentleman who never set out to draw one of his memorials to Parliament that the head of Charles the First did not sooner or later pop up in it. [Laughter.]

And so my good friend from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL], starting out to argue the military necessity for taking over the railroads of the United States, finally gets to settling his favorite problem of water-and-rail competition by getting the President of the United States to raise the freight rates.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I prefer not to do so at this time, as I have only five minutes. Somehow or other, there are other sinister or equally harmless shadows lurking around about this thing. It seems to me that some of our friends are mighty eager to seize upon this war emergency as a pretext for legislation that is by no means related to it and to accomplish some purpose by raising the popular slogan "Stand by the President" that they could not hope to have seriously considered at any other time and in any other way. I do not now pretend to bring you any special information on the subject, and we all understand that in five minutes it would be practically impossible; besides, the matter has been so well discussed as it is.

Thirty years ago when the interstate commerce law was born, or when it first went into effect, I was the chief clerk in the general freight department of a railroad, and I saw the first effects of the interstate commerce act when on a Sunday noon all of the tariffs of the whole United States, covering transcontinental, local, or joint traffic, went with one accord into the wastebasket; and for four years after that I abided in that same position. While I do not pose as an expert on railroad rates, and, after many years of retirement from the business, it would now be absurd to do so, still I remember enough of the old trade so that some of the things I have heard here to-day and during the past week about one man making the rates for the vast and complicated transportation systems of this country have sometimes tended to amuse me.

We are not now called upon to say whether the railroads of this land have been fairly or unfairly treated by Congress in years past. We are not now called upon to determine whether freight rates are in some cases too low and railroads have suffered unjustly because of that fact. My own opinion is that we probably have gone too far in our drastic laws and otherwise and have oppressed railroads somewhat at times or hindered their healthy and proper growth and development in some respects. But that is all beside the question here and now before us.

I have only one suggestion to make to this company. I have only one bit of emphasis to lay upon one point that has been brought out here so many times and yet seems so strangely to be overlooked when its proper application should be made. If, as is the purport of the policy behind this bill, we are simply taking over the railroads of the United States because of a dire military necessity and emergency, why are we not then content with putting into the hands of the Executive the power to operate the rolling stock and the motive power and the transportation systems as transportation systems, and forbid, if necessary, certainly never authorize, his going to the point of reaching his hand down to muddy the waters of our national commercial and business life besides? The power to fix freight rates is almost wholly in itself the power to control the industrial and commercial business of the country. Why should we give him authority to do that which is in nowise whatever associated with the military necessity? I do not understand how my good friend, the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, can rise here and blandly suggest to this House that the making of a rate may be some serious and critical point involved in the President's capacity as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and hinder some military project, when, as he knows and as we all know, that same President of the United States as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy under the Constitution of the United States can move any freight car or engine anywhere in the United States, rate or no rate, with nobody's consent, asking nobody's opinion about it. Then, why is this question of rates smuggled in at the back door in this fashion?

It seems to me when you get right down to brass tacks, as we say in New England, that somebody is holding up the edge of the canvas so that the camel's head can get under the tent, and that after this tremendous military emergency is out of the way, this military emergency that is so urgent, so critical, that we must have somebody pottering with rates in the White House, then we may see what becomes of some other parts of the interstate commerce law and the Interstate Commerce Commission, and see how many more footpaths must of necessity be beaten toward the Great White Lot at the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I would not be a very good waterways man if I was not fair to the railroads. There is a prejudice against the railroads which I do not indulge. There is a desire in some sections to cripple privately operated railroads, a desire which I do not encourage. I want to see more railroads, a larger service, and more trackage; no section of the country needs it more than mine. Along the Atlantic seaboard, east of the Appalachian chain, we do business for one-third of all of the people of this Nation upon one-fourth of the mileage of the United States. Gentlemen say nothing new has developed in this debate. My friend from Vermont [Mr. GREENE] is one of those who made that suggestion; but there is something new in this debate, and I have not heard it explained yet. When the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH], the able ranking minority member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, held the floor on Thursday last I asked him whether it was true, as suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT], that the President had the power and would use it to increase the wages of the railroad men 20, 30, or 40 per cent, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, having indicated that it was understood that the railroad men's wages, which would be a charge against the railroads, would be incresed at least 20 per cent.

And the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] said:

I suppose there will be increases of wages; I can not talk advisedly on that matter.

Whereupon the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], who is adept at railroad legislation, undertook to explain the situation.

He said:

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. ESCH. Yes.
Mr. LENROOT. I would like to suggest that when under private ownership the railroads had the power of increasing rates; that the rates had to be passed upon by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

I think, perhaps, there is a typographical error in the answer of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. That first "rate" should have been "wages." It is evidently an error. The wages are made by the railroads, but the rates are passed upon by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. So that the Interstate Commerce Commission had the power to fix rates heretofore, but did not attempt to adjust the wages. Now, it is quite probable that the taking over of the railroads by the President of the United States includes a program to increase the wages of employees, an important and dominant factor in the operation and direction of railroad property. I want to see the wages of railroad men increased. I do not see how the railroads of the country, under Government control or under private ownership, can successfully stand the increase of wages to the extent of 20 per cent, which seems to be conceded, or to 30 or 40 per cent, which is demanded, without having a corresponding increase in rates to offset the charge. No gentleman has explained that situation to my satisfaction, and the question has been put to two of the best railroad lawyers in this House.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I understand it to be the gentleman's argument that if we give to the President the exclusive power of making rates, the rates will certainly be increased, whereas if we leave them with the Interstate Commerce Commission they probably will not be?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No; I do not take that position arbitrarily, because the bill as written provides that when in the judgment of the President—"when in the judgment of the President"—rates may be initiated, and so forth. No power is taken away from the Interstate Commerce Commission, except "when in the judgment of the President it is necessary in the public interest he may initiate rates, fares, charges, classifications," and so forth, and even then, "when in the public interest." What is the public interest? This bill is a war bill. We have been voting only war bills in this session—bills in the public interest. This bill is one of those. It is in the war interest. The President, who is superior to the Interstate Commerce Commission, decides whether he shall initiate rates. When he so decides he is to have the power to do it; but even so, rates fixed by the President in emergency cases, in war cases, may go back to the Interstate Commerce Commission for review.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GORDON. The gentleman is mistaken about that last statement he made, because it is the very question we are discussing.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The bill states that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall upon complaint make investigation and grant full hearings concerning the fairness, justice, and reasonableness of all rates, fares, charges, classifications, and so forth. Special war service will be required——

Mr. GORDON. It is all it can grant.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania (continuing). When ordered by the President.

Mr. GORDON. It has no decision.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I quote the minority report on that point where it cites the demurrage case. It refers to the fact that the Director General of Railroads fixed a higher rate of demurrage on cars which were serving as storage warehouses. This question went to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and even after the new rates were fixed it came back to the Interstate Commerce Commission. Much as I appreciate the hard labor and intelligence put upon the report by the minority of that committee, I am inclined to think this citation shows a weakness in their argument.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. There is anotner provision in this bill the gentleman is talking about that provides that, notwithstanding all this war power and the fixing of rates, any rate fixed by the President or anybody else must be just and reasonable. Does the gentleman think that ought to be retained?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The "just and reasonable" clause is here, and if the President's rates are not just and reasonable those who have complaints go to the Interstate Commerce Commission in the usual way.

Nobody is hurting the Interstate Commerce Commission. Gentlemen have tried to distinguish between the Interstate Commerce Commission and the President. From my point of view, as I read this bill and both reports, there is really no difference between them. They act together; they operate as one, except that in certain cases where an emergency exists, when the going before the Interstate Commerce Commission takes time—months and months it may be—and an injustice may be done to the railroads, then the President may initiate rates and if they are wrong or unjust or inequitable, then the complainants go back to the Interstate Commerce Commission and try out their case. They get their hearing after the war emergency has been met.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania concur in the opinon of gentlemen that the Interstate Commerce Commission, being appointed by the President, would not find that the President had filed a rate that was either unjust or unreasonable?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think the Interstate Commerce Commission would agree with the President most of the time.

Mr. GORDON. It will have to, if the majority report is adopted

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think they will. Now, gentlemen, so long as we are at war and voting all kinds of power to the President of the United States, and have given him the power to increase the wages of the employees, why should not the President also have the power to make a corresponding increase in rates, so that the railroads will be able to pay the increase in wages due to the war? That is the situation. It is a set-off. And to show that some laboring men are fair upon this subject, apart from the railroads which are most interested, let me quote from T. L. Lewis, former international president of the United Mine Workers of America. He says:

> If necessary, Congress should instruct the Interstate Commerce Commission to grant relief to the railroads by a general increased freight and passenger rates for a stipulated period of time. This would enable the railroads to rehabilitate their transportation facilities. Would it not be better to increase freight and passenger rates and permit the traveling public and the shippers help pay for the improving transportation than to take off trains, suspend the operation of industry, close places of business, when people must travel, when there is a demand for manufactured articles, machinery, and equipment, and enough coal in sight to meet every demand for fuel, if transportation facilities are provided? The efficiency of our military and naval forces and the welfare of the people demand prompt action.

> We have no right to expect the highest standard of efficiency from a worn-out, sick, physically weak individual. The railroads of the United States are worn out, sick, and disabled from too much Government regulation, and apparently the indifference of the Interstate Commerce Commission to an inevitable condition, which has developed disastrously to the railroads, to industry and commerce, and to the people of the United States.

Cut the Gordian knot; play fair with the railroads; if this war necessitates it, give the workmen an increase in wages, and let the President do it under this bill.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, I discussed this question very fully in general debate and only want to make one or two observations now.

The Interstate Commerce Commission, in my judgment, has the confidence of the American people. It is a court to which the people may go. I have failed to hear a single reason advanced why this court should now be disbanded and placed in the dump heap. This bill provides that up to the 1st of July, 1918, the President may relinquish control over any road or system of roads. If we adopt that provision, we will allow the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix the rates upon the roads released from the Federal control and we will allow the President to initiate rates and control rates as to the roads under his control. Thus confusion will follow. It seems to me that there is a clear division between the control and operation of the railroads and the rate-making power. The rate-making power does not in any manner interfere with the operation of the railroad. The rate-making power ought not to be disturbed. There is no necessity for setting aside the laws upon the statute books. If we turn this power over to the President, I take it that we will turn it over to the military power of the Government. It will then cease to be a civil power. There is a distinct line between the military powers of the Government and the civil powers of the Government. These two authorities ought to cooperate. There should be no contest between them. Yet the military power, with its control and with its operation of the railroads, can everlastingly eliminate all rate-making power and destroy it absolutely. When we thus destroy the Interstate Commerce Commission the shipper will have no appeal anywhere to any court under the heavens. Where will these shippers, representing the commerce of this country, from every hamlet in all the broad land, go for their remedy when the rates are fixed by the military power of this great Government? No court, no commission, nobody to hear their grievances; without the right to go into any court. Does this Congress want to do that? Does this Congress want to grant that power and thus take away the right of appeal to the courts? You can not appeal to the courts from the military department of the Government, because the military power is supreme. The military power can destroy the power of the courts. It can arrest the judge upon the bench, prevent the court from deciding cases in favor of the enemies of the country, and confine the offending officer until the close of the war. Its power is supreme. This Congress ought not to destroy the rights of the people that are purely civil, that are purely administrative, that are largely commercial. The commercial interests of this country command some consideration at the hands of this Congress, and we ought not thus to disturb and confuse the commerce of the country and bring confusion and chaos into all the industries of the land. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back one minute.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, the provision of the bill under consideration gives the President power to fix rates, fares, and charges, and to make such classification, regulations, or practices as he may deem fair, reasonable, and just, on all the railroads of the United States during the period of Government control. By this provision this power, hitherto exercised by the Interstate Commerce Commission, is taken away from that body and is lodged exclusively with the President. The commission can act only in an advisory capacity.

The last section of the bill declares that its provisions are "expressly declared to be emergency legislation enacted to meet conditions growing out of the war." But rate making is not emergency legislation to meet conditions growing out of the war. To make and change rates, fares, and charges is part of the ordinary commercial business of the country. Such action relates only to transactions entirely civil in their nature. The Government is given the control of the railroads because the success of its war work is dependent in large part on transportation. So far as the transportation of troops, of munitions, and of war supplies are concerned, the demands of the Government are supreme and the transaction of all ordinary civil business must be made subordinate. We have granted ample power in this regard. But the ordinary travel, the ordinary shipment of farm products, of merchandise, and the articles which supply the every-day demands of the people should not be taken out of the usual well-settled course of procedure. The laws and regulations, the charges, and rates should remain as they are, or, if changed, should be changed in the manner prescribed by law. To assume the duty of rate making on ordinary business transportation is not part of the warlike preparations of the Government.

Every power the President needs he may exercise to use the railroads in any possible way for the carrying on of the war. If the President desires to transport war material or supplies, he can do so without rates. If he desires to make a rate, say, of coal to a munition plant, he can do so under the powers given him in the act of 1916 and in other provisions of this bill. But that is special, not general. That relates to Government business, not private business. That is a military measure, not a civil regulation. The power to fix rates on the general commerce of the country—the common, private business of the land—that is a thing entirely apart from the exercise of the war power, to which this bill by express provision is limited. The President has granted to him by legislation already enacted and which is contained in this bill absolute and unlimited power to control and operate the railroads for all and every war purpose. He can take off or put on trains. He can give priority to all war orders. He can make every other kind of traffic secondary. He can run all trains on war schedules.

But the railroads must be used by the people in the meantime for other than war purposes. The commerce of the country must be carried. The necessities of the people not engaged in war must be supplied. It is as necessary now as in times of peace that rates and charges should not be exorbitant. It is necessary that changes should be made only after careful investigation and a full hearing. To secure these results we have established the Interstate Commerce Commission. It has become a part of our governmental system. To its jurisdiction and control have become adjusted all the busines interests of the country. It is the development of 30 years of lawmaking and court interpretation. Many attempts have been made to destroy the usefulness of the commission, but they have proved unavailing, because it has obtained and now holds the confidence of the people. The farmers' associations, the stock growers' associations, the grain shippers' associations, the farm journals, representing the agricultural interests of the country, are now urging Congress to maintain the present jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Manufacturers' associations and the chambers of commerce of the great cities have also petitioned Congress to the same effect.

Gentlemen who advocate the abrogation of the functions of the Interstate Commerce Commission can hardly realize, I am sure, the consequences of such action. To deprive the people of the right to have determined upon a hearing by an impartial tribunal whether a given rate is just and reasonable is an act of such grave moment that nothing except absolute necessity would justify it. It is said that it is safe to lodge such power in the President. But this is not done. The President will have no hearings. In fact, the President will not act at all except as he is advised. The chief value of the commission consists of the fact that decisions are made upon public hearings conducted as a court is conducted, with fixed and orderly procedure. Evidence is submitted, arguments are heard, and final determination made after conference and deliberation, as are judicial decisions. The rates now fixed are the result of patient study and careful investigation. They have been made in many cases as findings on hearings that have extended over months. They have been presented and argued by the ablest lawyers the country affords.

I hold in my hand the last volume, volume 44, of the Interstate Commerce Reports, a series of decisions that would do credit to any court of last resort in the land. More than 10,000 cases have been decided by this great court and reported in this series. This volume contains more than 500 pages and reports many cases. Among them is a great case, the Pere Marquette case, the report of which alone covers 250 pages. I ask gentlemen whether or not it is possible for the President to consider and determine that class of cases? And if he will not consider them, who will? Will it be wise or expedient to have such great questions determined by some unknown adviser of the President, who may be interested and biased, and who is necessarily irresponsible? Should we without necessity throw away three decades of legislation, this large body of decisions and precedents, and the methods of orderly procedure established by long years of experience and trial?

Those who defend the proposed abolition of the Interstate Commerce Commission have not shown, nor can they show, how the retention of the present jurisdiction of the commission with regard to rate making will in the slightest degree interfere with the full control by the Government of the railroads for war purposes. It is not because the President desires such power that it is proposed. He is not to be complimented or pleased by granting it to him. He would not exercise it personally if granted. The President was granted power to take over and control the railroads. He exercised that power by making Mr. McAdoo the director. Who will be placed in charge of the rate-making power if granted to the President we do not know. It is safe to say, however, that it will not be the Interstate Commerce Commission, for if that were intended no provision would have been made for taking away the power from the commission.

It must be apparent that an effort is being made to commit to some one else the rate-making power, to be exercised through the President. It is because powerful influences are determined to destroy the commission or to take from it the power it has so wisely and impartially exercised. Some of the reasons for this are not far to seek. On this floor we have heard it said that because the commission did not advance rates as much as was desired that for that reason the President must be given the power so he could do so. In the 15 per cent advance rate case the railroads asked for about $400,000,000 increase in rates and revenue. The commission granted an increase to certain roads amounting to about $100,000,000. The refusal to grant all that was asked excited deep resentment in certain quarters. And now we have this condition presented: Because an impartial tribunal, after patient hearing, with due regard both to the railroads' demands and the people's rights, have fixed certain rates which they found to be just and reasonable, but which were unsatisfactory to the railroads, its power shall be taken away under the guise of a war measure and given to some one who will do what is desired. Being dissatisfied with the decision of the court, they would forthwith abolish the court.

It is said that the railroads should be self-supporting; that in order to make them so rates should be increased; and that as the Interstate Commerce Commission will not do so, some other way must be found to secure such result. In answer to that it may be said that no one can now tell what the results will be under the new management. It is hoped that with the reduction of high salaries, the abolition of useless expenditures, the elimination of waste and duplication and favoritism that expenses will be materially decreased. It is probable that an increase of wages of at least some of the employees should be made. How we shall come out when these things are done under conditions that will then exist it is impossible to anticipate. But, however that may be, if rates should be raised or lowered, the determination can better be made by an impartial tribunal such as the Interstate Commerce Commission than by an unknown person who may be appointed for that purpose by the President. The people have rights as well as the railroads. They do not ask favors, they only demand justice. They know they ought and must pay a full compensation for the service rendered. But it is one of the chiefest benefits of our institutions and our laws that all public-service corporations are subject to regulation in the interest of the people. The people in this case only ask that the jurisdiction and power of the Interstate Commerce Commission should be retained in civil transactions between the railroads and the people as it has existed in the past. In order to accomplish that result the amendment should be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Let the gentleman from Wisconsin use some time. I am still one minute ahead.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I am in favor of the amendment that has been offered. I have listened to a great deal of debate on the bill and I have failed to hear anyone tell the committee yet who would in fact fix the rates if the bill is passed in its present form.

Now, they say that the power to fix the rates is given under certain conditions to the President, and we, of course, know that the President can not do it himself. Perhaps it will be exercised by Mr. McAdoo, the Director of Railroads. I understand that Mr. McAdoo at the very best can give only about two hours a day to those duties which are imposed on him by reason of being Director of Railroads. We know, then, that Mr. McAdoo himself will not do this work. Then who will do it? It does seem to me that if Congress is going to grant this extraordinary power to some one, the Congress and the people ought to know who it is that is going to fix the rates. Evidently the President will not do so, nor will the Director of Railroads; but he will have to refer it to some one else, and we do not know who that is. I think if it has got to be referred to some other person or some other tribunal, it ought to be to the Interstate Commerce Commission, who have had this power all the time.

Mr. LAZARO. And they are the creature of the President.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, just here I want to make some brief general observations on the bill, as I did not have a chance to do so under general debate.

It seems to me that there are a great many, or at least some, Members in the House who have an idea that this legislation will lead ultimately to Government control of railroads and perhaps of other public utilities, and there are some who think that this legislation ought to be used for a sort of experimental purpose in Government control. Now, I think that there ought not to be any provisions in the bill except such as are necessary to carry out the single purpose of the bill, and that is emergency war legislation. Therefore I am opposed to that provision of the bill which would extend the time for returning the properties to their owners to two years after the war, and I am opposed to this provision in the bill which gives this power to the President to fix the rates, because I can not see, and I have heard no argument yet from anyone that has convinced me, that the power of fixing a rate for the shipment of freight or any other rate is a war power.

Now, I can not conceive of any sort of circumstances arising under which it will be absolutely necessary for a rate to be fixed on the moment. If the statement of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET] is true, that if his amendment carries the President will still have the power to initiate rates, it seems to me that any necessity that will grow out of the state of war will have been met by the President having that power to initiate rates.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What is the difficulty about letting the Director of Railroads fix the rates?

Mr. DENISON. Because it will be absolutely impossible for him to do it. The Director of Railroads is the Secretary of the Treasury. He is also the head of the Federal Reserve Board and of the Farm Loan Board, and I understand that they are going to make him head of this new financial corporation that will control all the finances of the country.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And he is a candidate for the Presidency.

Mr. DENISON. I understand so. And with all his manifold duties it will be impossible for him to give the matter of fixing rates any attention. He will have to leave it to some one else.

Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the discussions of the bill by the different Members. It is apparent to me, as I have said, that there are some Members who consider this as purely temporary legislation, made necessary by the existence of a state of war and justified only by reason of that fact.

There are others who would treat it as permanent legislation, precipitated by the state of war but justified as an economic and governmental reform, leading ultimately to Government ownership and operation of all public utilities. These are the two extreme views. There are still others who would consider it as war legislation, temporary in character, but who would so shape its provisions that it can be utilized as an experiment in Government operation and control to guide future Congresses in the consideration of that great question. If I may be permitted to hazard a guess, I would say that those who were responsible for this bill in its original form—the President and the Director of Railroads—are among those who would treat it as war legislation to be used at the same time as an experiment in governmental operation, to the end that, if successful as a war measure, it may ultimately become a permanent part of the economic policy of the Nation. I think the provisions of the bill as originally drawn clearly show this. Why else should anyone want the Government to continue operating the railroads indefinitely after the war has ended and peace has been restored?

So the question is squarely up to Congress whether we shall enact this legislation as a mere temporary measure made necessary by the war or as permanent legislation launching the policy of Government ownership, or as a war measure, to be continued indefinitely or to some definite but unnecessarily distant time, for experimental and possibly for political purposes. When the bill is finally passed its provisions will reflect the views of a majority of Congress as to which of these three purposes or policies the legislation should represent.

Now, I am opposed to any experimental legislation on an important and vital question of this kind. I am opposed to using the necessities that arise out of this war to try out any illusive dreams or theories of socialism. Some sort of legislation of this kind is of course necessary, since the President has already, under the exercise of his war powers, taken control of the railroads of the country. We must provide for compensation for their use, for their management during the period of Government control, and for their return to their rightful owners. But I do not think the Government should keep the railroads a day longer than is necessary to accomplish the purpose it is claimed justified the President in taking them over.

Mr. Chairman, I have for years been opposed to any form of Government ownership or operation of railroads. My observation since I have been a Member of this House has made me even stronger than before in this conviction, and nothing has been said during the debate on this bill that has convinced me to the contrary.

I do not think the Government has any business owning or operating any kind of a business enterprise like the railroads. I believe that competition and the desire for profit have given our country the best transportation service in the world. And I believe that competition and the desire for profit are under our form of government and in a country like ours absolutely necessary to the maintenance of good railroad service and to continued improvements in the service.

Neither competition nor the incentive for profit are possible under Government ownership or control.

I have listened with deep interest to discussions by different Members of the success or failure of Government ownership of railroads in other countries. I do not think the experiences of other countries are of any important value to us on this question, because no other country that has tried it has the same natural or economic conditions, nor the same forms of government that we have. There will be enough grave and important questions growing out of the war and for the next 20 years following the war that are really and properly governmental questions to occupy all of the time and attention of the Government, without its going into the railroad business.

While I believe the President had and should have had the power to take over the railroads and temporarily operate them as a war necessity, I do not think the necessity for such action had arisen when the President acted. I think it was a mistake for the President to take possession when it did. The owners of the roads can operate them any time better, more efficiently, and more economically than the Government can. Congress could, upon recommendation by the President, have acted just as quickly and enacted such legislation as might have been necessary to temporarily relieve the railroads of any legal restrictions imposed upon them by the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Sherman antitrust law, which would have interfered in any manner with the free use of the railroads for war purposes. If this had been done, Congress would have been spared the perplexing problems that are involved in the legislation now under consideration, and in my judgment many others that are sure to follow.

The railroads are in far worse condition and transportation service is far more inefficient than before the roads were taken over by the President. So I think it was a mistake to take them over at all. There was no necessity for it that could not have been fully met in a better way.

I am opposed to Government ownership of railroads because the property values of the railroads of this country amounts in the aggregate to from eighteen to twenty billion dollars and there are 1,700,000 employees now in their service. That is too much money and too many men to be used as a football in the political game in a Republic like ours. We can not afford to determine questions of this kind on the assumption that there will always be wise men and good men in control of the Government. We must do so rather with the possibility in mind that men unwise and overambitious or weak and unscrupulous may be in control. And power is a dangerous thing in the hands of weak or overambitious men.

But the 1,700,000 railroad employees are, or some day will be, federated with many million others employed in other fields of industry. It would be an unfortunate thing, in my judgment, for that many men to be in the service of a Government like ours. All questions of wages and welfare would usually if at all be adjusted on political rather than economic or industrial grounds. With a strong and determined man at the head of the Government the great army of railroad employees might be unjustly dominated and their best interests submerged, and this would be a bad thing for the railroad men. With a weak or overambitious man at the head of the Government, the railroad employees could completely dominate the Government. Either condition would be unfortunate if not dangerous for the country. I do not think this bill should be passed with a single provision in it that could be construed as an encouragement to those who believe in Government ownership.

Let us be candid with ourselves and with the country and make it plain that this legislation is a war necessity only.

I will support the bill if it is amended so as to be what it is represented to be—legislation necessarily resulting from the state of war—and if some of the provisions of the bill that are absolutely inexcusable are eliminated from it.

I am opposed to the Government keeping possession of the railroads two years after peace has been declared. I think that length of time is unreasonable and would be so held by the courts; it is also unnecessary, and is intended as a compromise with those who believe in Government ownership, or who would experiment with it. And I will not vote for the bill unless it is amended so as to provide for the return of the railroads to their owners in a less time than two years after the close of the war.

I am unalterably opposed to giving the President or the Director of Railroads, or any other one man, the power to fix railroad rates. The fixing of railroad rates is a legislative and not an executive function. It requires a most fertile imagination to conceive of the rate-fixing power as a necessary war power. It is not a war power at all. It is nothing more nor less than an abdication by the Congress of one of its legislative powers, and the conferring it upon one man who we all know could not himself exercise it and would not exercise it.

I have not heard one sound reason given during this debate why the Interstate Commerce Commission, that has heretofore had the right by act of Congress to finally fix railroad rates, should not do so while the roads are under Government control. Certainly the Interstate Commerce Commission is better qualified than any other person or any other tribunal in this country to determine reasonable rates. I see no reason why they could not, when requested by the President, determine rates just as equitably and as speedily as any other person or tribunal could possibly do.

I am willing to give the President the power to initiate rates during the continuance of the war and as a war necessity. But the Interstate Commerce Commission should under any circumstances retain its authority to finally determine the reasonableness of the rates.

To give the President or the Director of Railroads this extraordinary power of fixing railroad rates, in addition to the other unusual powers they now possess, would be conferring upon them more power than is now possessed by the Kaiser or any other person in the world. And I will not vote for the bill if it contains the provision giving the President this power. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET] will be adopted.

Mr. Chairman, I have already since the beginning of the war voted for various bills conferring extraordinary powers upon the President. I have done so because I thought those measures were necessary to enable the country to more effectively prosecute and terminate the war. But we have conferred about as much power on the President as we should confer, and about as much power as we will confer, so far as my vote is concerned. Last session we passed legislation giving the President general control over the food and fuel of the country. With practically a unanimous vote Congress conferred this power upon the President because we thought it necessary as a war measure.

And yet this winter we have seen the President, through the Fuel Administrator, issuing orders that were not only beyond and outside of any powers conferred upon him by the act of Congress, but were arbitrary, unwise, and, in my judgment, inexcusable and subversive of the public interests. And the Food Administrator has issued orders restricting the grinding of wheat by country mills that have not only been disastrous to the interests of the country millers and wheat growers in the great wheat belt in Illinois and the Middle West, but which have not, in my judgment, contributed materially to any better conservation or distribution of the country's bread supply.

These extraordinary powers can be easily abused or unwisely exercised. And we should not confer them upon anyone unless there is a clear case of necessity for it.

So far as I am concerned, I shall not vote for any measure that will confer upon the President, or Mr. McAdoo, or any other person any greater power than they now have unless I am convinced beyond all doubt that it is absolutely necessary to help us successfully prosecute and speedily terminate the war. And I will not vote for this bill if it retains the provision giving the President the power to fix rates for the railroads of the country.

I think, too, the bill provides compensation to the railroads for the use of their properties during the government control that is excessive and is unjust to the people who will have to pay the bills.

Mr. ESCH. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWITZER].

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the gentlemen who have expressed themselves as being so solicitous as to the success of the President in the operating of these railroads were remiss in their duty when the question of the consideration of the standard return was before this body. Who is selected by this bill to fix the maximum standard return? The proponents of this measure placed that duty upon the Interstate Commerce Commission, because they recognized that they had the information, that the commission was composed of gentlemen of ability and training for that work. At that time they did not want to trust the President to fix the maximum standard return, but they put a limitation upon the President by a provision which referred the whole matter to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and a certificate from that commission is binding upon the President. If you wanted the President to be sure to make the operation of these railways a success and not allow the expense of operating to exceed too far the returns from the freight and passenger traffic, why did you put a maximum limit upon the President's right to fix the standard return? Was it because you did not want to trust him? Is that it? You say that we who favor a limitation upon the rate-making power do not want to trust the President. We can with equal propriety say that in fixing the standard return you did not want to trust the President. But I think we are all willing to trust the President. I agree with those who believe that the railways were taken over chiefly to save the credit of the railways and not so much that it was expected that the Government would successfully operate them. I do not believe for the next year that there is any power on earth that can make a success of the operation of the railways of this country. I do not believe the railways broke down. There was simply an inordinate demand on their capacity that they did not have the facilities to fulfill. You can say that the War Department broke down; you can say that when the Government has ordered a lot of uniforms for the soldiers and they have not been received for five or seven months that the uniform-making departments of the country broke down. You can say that all these munitions factories that have been built up by English and French orders all over the country making thousands and hundreds of thousands of pounds of explosives and arms for war purposes broke down. Why? Because of the exorbitant demands upon them.

The railways were able to carry the ordinary traffic of the country as it was developed before the declaration of war, but we by the declaration of war put upon them more than they could do. They have not broken down.

I do not think that anyone believes that the railroads will be any more successfully operated under the Director General appointed by the President than they were under the great railway heads of this country, any further than they are given more power by the legislation that we enact here to make through rates over the country and by pooling, but, so far as the operation is concerned, the President and Director General must depend upon those who have experience in that line. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT].

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, there is no one provision in this bill which in my judgment deserves more careful consideration than this does. I recognize very fully the immense importance of the provision granting to the executive power the right to initiate rates. I recognize with equal force the great gravity of taking away from a long-established tribunal, the Interstate Commerce Commission, this right to revise and finally settle upon the rates.

I am frank to say that, primarily, my sentiment was against the idea of lodging this great power in the hands of the Executive. Every man who thinks logically must come to one conclusion ultimately, and that is that we must have due regard and respect for established forms of procedure, and that all innovations and alterations of that which has been established by long custom, and found to be efficient, should be regarded with a great deal of caution and not adopted except after weighty consideration. Therefore, I am frank to say now to this committee that, were it not for the immense necessity of this matter, if I were not deeply impressed with the urgency of the occasion, I would unhesitatingly cast my vote in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. DEWALT. Not just now; I will in a moment answer all questions if I have time. I have tried with an unbiased mind, without any reflex action in regard to partisan fealty, or without any regard even of upholding the executive power simply because the executive power is now democratic, to look at this matter squarely from the standpoint of what is the best thing to do under the circumstances.

Let me start by saying that the act of 1916, in my judgment at least, gives the President of the United States the power to fix rates. The act of 1916, by its provisions, in brief, says this:

> That the President in time of war is empowered, through the Secretary of War, to take possession and assume control of any system of transportation.

In looking at the legal definition of the word "control," I find that it is defined by an Illinois decision (185 Ill.) as this:

> The words "manage" and "control" are held to be synonymous. Manage is defined to mean "direct, control, govern, administer, or oversee." That is a decision in 144 Pa., page 377.

Webster defines the word "manage" as follows:

> Meaning "to have under control and direction, to conduct, to guide, to administer, or to handle."

I take it as a logical sequence of the wording of this act, which says "the President shall have possession and control," and in the following words, in the same section, "exclusive possession and control," that he has the right to administer. If he has the right to administer he has the right over the financial transactions of the company. If he has the right to administer the financial transactions of the company it follows as clearly as daylight follows the night that he must have the right to fix the charges for freight and passenger traffic. There can be no other logical conclusion. That is the act of 1916. Whether it be wise or unwise, you now have it on the statute books. The question now presents itself, will you, by implication or by direct legislation, by the adoption of the Sweet amendment, revoke what you did under the act of 1916?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. That is the act under which we took the railroads over?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes; and the proclamation of the President followed. That is the war act. If that be true, then the question presents itself, what reason is there for maintaining the statute as it now is? I want to be brief and I shall try to present in a few words what those reasons are.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I have listened to what the gentleman has said, and I have been trying to find a reason why the President should be given this power as a war measure. The intent is not, as I understand it, to lower the rates. The intent must be to give him authority to raise the rates. Why is it necessary as a war power to give him that authority when it is admitted that the income of the railroads since the war is the greatest since we had railroads in this country?

Mr. DEWALT. Right there I can not agree with the gentleman. I think the power should be given not only to lower the rates but to raise the rates. I think I can show why it should be so. In the first place, let us take this undoubted fact. There is now existing, and there will be in the future, a diversion of freight upon the railroads of this country. We know now from the newspapers and from reports from the railroads themselves that there has been a diversion of passenger traffic to the Pennsylvania and of freight traffic to the Baltimore & Ohio—necessitated by what? By the emergency. In other words, certain lines have been devoted almost exclusively to freight traffic and others again have had diverted to them the passenger traffic. We know another thing, that passenger traffic is not the paying traffic on the railroads. They do not make money out of the passenger traffic; they make money out of the freight rates. Therefore it may be necessary for the President of the United States to initiate rates by which he increases the passenger rates in order to equalize things and decrease freight rates in order to equalize these roads.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. He could not do that as between the railroads.

Mr. DEWALT. Why, yes; he could if he had financial control.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Give a higher passenger rate to one road than to another?

Mr. DEWALT. Certainly; under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Not at this time. It may be necessary, as it was in England, to decrease the passenger traffic, and why? Because some of these roads are the main trunk lines and of necessity must be used for the transportation of foodstuffs and munitions of war. In England what did they do? They raised the passenger rates in order to prevent passenger traffic, and it may be necessary for the President of the United States to initiate high rates for passenger traffic in order to keep people at home from pleasure trips and unnecessary travel.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. There would be an easier way to do it than that, and that would be to cut off the trains.

Mr. DEWALT. Certainly; but you do not want to stop the flow of blood through the arteries. You might as well say that the easiest way to do it would be to bury the individual by cutting off his head.

Mr. MADDEN. On the question of rates, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman have any fear that the Interstate Commerce Commission would refuse to grant a just rate?

Mr. DEWALT. I have not the slightest fear of that.

Mr. MADDEN. Then why should we worry?

Mr. DEWALT. But I have this fear: Prolonged investigations will follow, and the necessities of the occasion demand speedy action. I am with the gentleman on the broad proposition.

Mr. MADDEN. Why?

Mr. DEWALT. Excuse me, but I do not want to be interrupted in the logical conclusions I want to present.

Mr. MADDEN. But this in in line with what the gentleman is presenting. I say why would the necessity arise for an immediate occasion?

Mr. DEWALT. I will give the gentleman one instance. There are now 1,700,000 employees in the railroad service, according to figures. I understand—I do not know with authority—that these 1,700,000 employees are now demanding an increase in wages ranging from 20 to 40 per cent. Suppose that to-morrow morning a majority of these 1,700,000 employees, through the intervention or intercession of their chiefs, say, "We will stop work unless we are paid higher wages."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. DEWALT. Suppose that to-morrow morning a majority of these men, through their labor organizations, should say, "We will cease work unless you pay us"; the President might by the necessities of the occasion say, "We will raise the wages." Under the Adamson bill the wages were raised for railroad employees $60,000,000 in one year. How are you going to meet that emergency? By going to the Interstate Commerce Commission and asking for a raise of rates and waiting three or four or five months until a decision comes, or will you say that the President shall have the power to initiate rates—not to fix them, but to put them into operation?

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. DEWALT. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. Is there any more reason why the President should have the right, without any delay or interference, to raise a rate because wages were raised than the railroad companies had?

Mr. DEWALT. I did not quite catch the gentleman's question.

Mr. MADDEN. Is there any more reason why we should give the President the right to raise rates because of increased compensation to the men than the railroad companies should have that right, which they did not get?

Mr. DEWALT. Why, at that time the railroad companies were not confronted with the condition of war.

Mr. MADDEN. They were confronted with the question of increased compensation to men by reason of legislation.

Mr. DEWALT. Exactly; that is the right given under the Adamson Act, and it cost the railroad companies $60,000,000; and now you propose to legislate and take away this power from the President of the United States and refer it again to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and all this time the trouble has been going on and everything disorganized.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. I will.

Mr. SNYDER. Is it not a fact that after the Adamson law went into effect the railroad companies did ask for an increased rate of the Interstate Commerce Commission? Did they get it?

Mr. DEWALT. They did not get it.

Mr. LENROOT and Mr. WINSLOW rose.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. I yield to my colleague on the committee first.

Mr. WINSLOW. I would like to ask if they ever did ask for an increase in rates after the Adamson Act went into effect?

Mr. DEWALT. My recollection is that they did, but I am not certain.

Mr. WINSLOW. Will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. DEWALT. Certainly.

Mr. WINSLOW. Is there any more reason to think that the members of the Interstate Commerce Commission under the strain and exigency of war will not get a gait on themselves as much as the President?

Mr. DEWALT. Well, they are pretty speedy individuals at times.

Mr. WINSLOW. Does the gentleman think we would have any more reason to feel that the President would act any more promptly in this matter than he did in meeting the question of preparedness?

Mr. DEWALT. I am frank to say I do not know that. Let me give another reason why I think the President should have this right. We have provided in this bill, and the gentlemen should clearly remember this, that the President would have the right to use a portion of the revolving fund for the purchase of bonds and also that he shall have the right to issue obligations for maturing obligations that might become due during the term of Federal control. Now, the money is not provided for that, except in so far as the revolving fund is concerned, $500,000,000. I take it that if he deems it necessary to purchase or to issue, if you please, new obligations for these maturing obligations there should be reposed in the President the power to initiate rates—not to fix them, if you please—because the right to review still remains. If this were an absolute grant to the President of the United States ultimately, conclusively, and definitely to fix rates without appeal, I would be unalterably opposed to it; but the right of appeal would still remain in the courts and the right of review in the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. I will.

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to ask the gentleman what right the President or any other authority has to raise rates for the purpose of paying the indebtedness of the railroads?

Mr. DEWALT. None whatever.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman so stated.

Mr. DEWALT. Except in the operation of the road.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman so stated.

Mr. DEWALT. Oh, no. My friend from Wisconsin has a very delightful way of picking out one word in a sentence, or possibly one phrase in a sentence, and distorting the same to his own views or purposes, but that is not the way to argue a question. The way to argue a question is from the four points and four corners of it, just as you would construe a will. You do not construe a will by taking one phrase of it. You take the whole will together and if you take this whole act together you find that the President is to have control of the financial department of these railroads, and if he has control of the financial department of them, he ought to have control of the initiative power with respect to rates.

Mr. LENROOT. Did not the gentleman state that in order to purchase these securities of railroads it might be necessary for the President to raise the rates?

Mr. DEWALT. I still say so. The gentleman asked me about the initial power.

Mr. LENROOT. The constitutional power.

Mr. DEWALT. That is a different proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ESCH. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. STEVENSON).

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, there is one thing that is certainly evident in this discussion, and that is that those who are proponents of the bill as it stands expect it to be used for the purpose of raising rates. Now, there need not anybody get mixed up about that. There has nobody here offered any reason that amounts to anything for this power except the reason that it may become necessary to raise the rates. The gentleman who has just spoken said that it might become necessary to raise passenger rates in order to keep people at home, and it would not do to rely upon the Interstate Commerce Commission to raise those rates. Well, now, if the gentleman has kept up with current history he will know that within the last 20 days passenger fares on mileage books have been raised a quarter of a cent a mile by this same Interstate Commerce Commission. Therefore, the argument that the Interstate Commerce Commission will not make and raise any rates if it becomes necessary is certainly begging the question.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] said a while ago that he was unable to see any reason why rates should not be raised; that if transportation systems break down it would be necessary, and it would be probable that wages would be raised; and he wanted to know why rates should not be raised also, and that nobody had given him any reason why they should not be raised. Now, I want to know why they should be raised; and that is a very important question to the business of this country. And the other is, how they shall be raised. In the last 12 months, the last fiscal year, the railroads that are called railroads, 230,000 miles of them, made a net income—I mean their railway operating income, which is with all expenses and taxes, and all of that paid, and the balance that is left—made an operating income of $1,069,000,000 on $18,000,000,000. In other words, as a whole they made over 5 per cent. Now, that is considered a fair net return for any operating property.

The Government will pay as a standard return to the roads under this bill $945,000,000, leaving on the above basis $124,000,000 margin to care for increased wages.

Now, why should we be talking that we have got to raise rates? There is no evidence that business is decreasing. And that is on the whole system. They have been taken over and unified and made into a system, and in making rates the Supreme Court of the United States has said that you can not hold that a rate is confiscatory unless all the operations of the road, regardless of this rate along with it, are not sufficient to bring in an adequate return. The fact that one rate on one commodity makes it a loss when they carry that commodity does not destroy all the rates if all the other operations of the system make a fair return. So if all the operations of the system we have taken over make a fair return, where is the necessity for raising the rates? And if you are going to raise them, my friend from New York says, they will have to be raised quickly and without investigation. Now, if you are going to raise rates without investigation, let us give the commission that has the information, that is expert at the business, the right to raise them, and not the President, who has had no experience. And if any of you have been up against the rate business you know that a man has to have experience before he knows anything about it.

The gentleman also stated that the necessity for raising rates would have to be exercised at once. I want to call the attention of this House to the fact that the raising or changing of rates is the most demoralizing thing on the business of the country that can possibly be imagined. If you make a rate that is not a proper one, you will demoralize business, because all the business of the great manufacturing concerns are conducted on the proposition that they will make their contracts based upon the rate to the place where they sell. That enters into every contract for sale, and if the rate is too high you will cause millions of dollars of loss to the manufacturing interests of this country, because you have a rate which will make unprofitable every contract that is outstanding. [Applause.]

I have offered as an amendment the provision adopted by the Senate, which gives the President the right to initiate and put into effect rates, subject to be reviewed and finally fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission. There are two sets of people only that know enough to make rates in this country—the Interstate Commerce Commission and the experts of the railroads. The President will have to rely on one set or the other. Manifestly, the commission is more likely to deal fairly with the people, because they are not interested. The railroad experts will want to put rates high in the hope that after Federal control they will continue high. The commission should be charged with this, because it has no selfish interest to serve. This rate matter may be so manipulated as to destroy towns, manufacturing establishments, and ports, and carries the powers to levy, in the form of transportation charges, millions of taxes on the people, and should be carefully guarded. [Applause.]

Mr. ESCH. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SCOTT].

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, there is only one question involved in the amendment now before the committee, and this is the question: "Shall the Interstate Commerce Commission continue to establish the rates of common carriers engaged in interstate commerce or shall that function be performed by the President?"

In a controversy it is usual that two or more parties are interested, but an unusual situation presents itself in this matter now before us, because only one party is vitally and materially interested in the decision which this Congress shall make on this feature of the bill. That one party comprises every manufacturing establishment, every producer, and every consumer in the United States. The railroads have no interest in who shall make the rates during the time the Government controls and operates their roads, because their compensation is fixed under the terms of this bill and in no way depends upon the revenue obtained during this period of governmental control and supervision. The President can have no real interest in fixing the rates, because under his constitutional power he can compel the carrying of any commodities necessary or incident to the military program, and with his complete control and supervision of the railroad systems of the country the matter of rates can not be material to him. It is simply a question of taking money out of one pocket and putting it into another, whatever the rates may be. No one is deluded with the idea that the President will ever fix these rates, even if he is given the authority to do so in this bill. That is a human impossibility, which even the oratorical proponents of the bill can not overcome. This duty must be assigned and must be performed by some commission who will possess virtually the same powers now possessed by the Interstate Commerce Commission. You will strip the Interstate Commerce Commission of all its powers and duties—everything but its salary—and you will delegate the powers and duties to a commission appointed by the President who will not have, and can not have, the invaluable experience and knowledge which years of training has given to the members of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The manufacturer, producer, shipper, and consumer will pay tribute to the inefficiency of this new organization. There is every reason to expect and believe that this new board, which will be appointed if you pass this bill as it now stands, will offer the pathetic spectacle of unavoidable incompetency which appears in a number of similarly appointed boards called upon to do a character of work with which they are entirely unfamiliar. I do not doubt the sincere efforts of these men, but the country is unwilling to educate new men, and to suffer their shortcomings during the education, where the Government has in its employ men already educated and the machinery fully and completely equipped to handle the character of work to be done.

Last winter when people were suffering and freezing in various sections of the country, due to the lack of shipping facilities for coal and a general shortage of cars, one of these newly appointed boards took 40 cars and turned them over to a cabinet file manufacturing company in North Carolina to be used in the shipment of file cases to the various exemption boards throughout the country. Those cars were used in that service for over three months, and in instances unnumbered the file cases could have been purchased by the various exemption boards in their home towns for less money than was actually paid by the Government, thereby saving not only in the purchasing cost but also allowing the congested traffic of the country to be relieved with those 40 cars so needlessly occupied. Some gentlemen indicate that this is an exceptional case. About the same time that those 40 cars were needlessly congesting the traffic of the country another order was issued by this newly appointed board, with decidedly greater power than ability, in which they gave 150 cars to a manufacturing concern located in one of the largest cities in the United States to be used in the transportation of lumber for the construction of buildings incident to the performance of a Government contract. Those 150 cars were used by that company to obtain the lumber and clog the already congested railroad facilities. At the very minute the order was made and all during the time those cars were in transit the same quality of lumber could have been purchased in the town where this concern is located for exactly the same amount of money as was actually paid for the lumber purchased.

Some one may suggest that these instances occurred last winter. Very well, let us get one up to date. Last week the Priority Board, upon the request of the Director of Inland Transportation, issued an order for 140 cars to be placed at different Michigan points for hay shippers. Fifteen of these cars were given to a man buying hay in a small town in the upper peninsula of Michigan. In that same small town there are at least four other concerns buying hay for the Government on the same kind of a contract held by the gentleman who was favored with a priority order for 15 cars. All of the other buyers have their hay ready to be shipped and are unable to get cars until this one favored gentleman has exhausted his supply of 15 cars. Why were they not prorated? I can not answer the question and have been unable to find anyone on the Priority Board or in the War Department who would even attempt to answer it. Every man's action was based on the recommendation or order of some one else. In tracing matters of this character through the various departments I venture the assertion that my experience just related has been the experience of every Member of Congress. It is about time that Congress stopped authorizing these new educational bureaus and boards and allowed the work to be done by those who have had the experience and whose past efforts have proven their ability and efficiency.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired. If there is no further discussion desired, the Clerk will read.

Mr. ESCH. Has the gentleman from Tennessee concluded debate on this amendment?

Mr. SIMS. No; unless all quit it. Are you willing to have a vote?

Mr. ESCH. The gentleman has 30 minutes. I have 29.

Mr. SIMS. I am perfectly willing that a vote should be had.

Mr. ESCH. We have two or three gentlemen on this side to whom I would like to yield before a vote is taken.

Mr. SIMS. I will yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I do not desire to speak on this amendment. I desire to point out that this debate was limited only to the rate-making provision. I have an amendment to the tax clause. The Chairman was asking the Clerk to read.

The CHAIRMAN. Nobody was ready to proceed apparently.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I am ready to proceed with the tax matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The time is in control of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. The gentleman from Tennessee is entitled to recognition.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman from Wisconsin can go ahead and use some more time.

Mr. ESCH. I have already used more time than the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. SIMS. I know. I am willing to have a vote right now.

Mr. ESCH. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman and gentleman of the committee, I favor the adoption of the Sweet amendment. I take the position that the Congress is the only authority that has the power to make railroad rates. Under the decision in the Minnesota Rate Case, reported in Two hundred and thirtieth United States Reports, page 433, the Supreme Court announced this principle:

> The rate-making power is a legislative power, and necessarily implies a range of legislative discretion. We do not sit as a board of revision to substitute our judgment for that of the legislature or of the commission lawfully constituted by it as to matters within the province of either.

Now, it was pursuant to the provision in the Federal Constitution which granted to the Congress, which is an organization of delegated authority, the power "to regulate commerce among the States" that we have taken up the subject of regulating commerce at all. In 1887 Congress under this clause in the Constitution created the Interstate Commerce Commission, which is a commission that has been established now for more than 30 years, and has investigated the railroad properties of the country, ascertained their value, and fixed rates for all of them, and has compiled a large and extensive system of reports and decisions for guidance in this rate-making proposition. In 1906 the Hepburn bill enlarged and extended the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and since that time it has been recognized by the carriers and by the public as the proper authority to regulate rates, the rates being promulgated always by the shipper or by the carrier and ratified and approved or disallowed by the commission. Now, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT], who is on the committee, has sought to give a very strained and extended construction to the act under which the President assumed control of the railroads of the United States. I refer to the act of August 29, 1916. I submit to the good judgment of this House that no man in this body thought that when we passed the act of August 29, 1916, which was a war-emergency act, that we were giving to the President of the United States even the right to take over the railroads and retain them in time of peace, but we all thought we were giving him the right only to take them over in time of war.

Not one of us dreamed that we were giving him the right to make rates for the transportation of troops or commodities or freight over those railroads. The gentleman says that this right is found in the words "assume control" contained in the bill. Not so. If we had been going to give the President the right to make rates, we would have used the well-known phrase used in the Federal Constitution which the Supreme Court says gives that right, namely, "the right to regulate the commerce amongst the States," which, in this case, would be between the shipper and the consignee. We used this term in that act, "assume control," not the word "regulate," and we went on to say that it was for the purposes of "war emergency," dealing at that time not with the proposition that confronts us today, of a war with Germany, but a little war that we had on the borders with Mexico, assuming that we were giving the President the right to take over the lines of transportation only that lead into Mexico.

Now, gentlemen of the committee, do we propose to say that the power of Congress shall be vested in one individual, to make rates for all the railroads of the United States? This rate-making proposition is a complicated one. The men who deal with the rates on our great railroads are all experts, and the men who surround and serve on the Interstate Commerce Commission, with its 30 years of precedents, are also experts, and they resort to its decisions for their authority just as the courts quote the decisions in construing and enforcing the law. We have had some experience with the Executive in making rates. The price of coal was fixed by a meeting of 400 coal operators of this country assembled here in Washington, with a member of the Cabinet presiding during their deliberations. They fixed the price at $3 per ton for coal, and a short time thereafter the President, without consulting and without notice—he will have no reason to consult in this instance—reduced the price from $3 to $2. We have had some other experience with the President fixing prices. He fixed the price of wheat at $2, and there is a great clamor and objection all over this country from our farmers that the price of wheat is fixed too low. He admittedly fixed the price of coal too low, because he increased the price to $2.45, and a second time increased it to $3.05, the present price, and the result of the price of $2 a ton that he fixed for coal has been the distress that we have experienced all over this country, and the suffering, without precedent, that has occurred during the cold months of this winter.

We have had more experience, too, in this matter of price fixing by one man, as here proposed. If you are going to leave it to the President—or, as some say, that it will go to the Director of Railroads, who fixed the price of demurrage on cars one Saturday night and raised it two or three dollars per car per day without hearing, without investigation, and without notice—that is the sort of thing we shall meet with if we are going to give this rate-fixing power into the hands of the President or any other individual. Here are three examples—the price of coal, the price of wheat, and the cost of demurrage. They have been fixed by the President or the Director of Railroads. In each instance they were fixed without notice, arbitrarily, and in each instance they have either given universal dissatisfaction or they have been admittedly wrong, because they have been changed afterwards upon further investigation because of the great suffering and public clamor in each instance against the action taken.

It has been argued that section 11 of the bill, which authorizes the President not only to fix rates but to initiate rates, gives also the right to the Interstate Commerce Commission to investigate the same. It is true that it does give the Interstate Commerce Commission the right to investigate the rates when changes were ordered by the President, but lines 4 to 8, inclusive, page 13 of the bill, provides:

And shall make report of its—

The commission—

findings and recommendations concerning the same to the President, for such action as the President may deem required in the public interest.

It will be seen by this quoted language that the President is the judge as to whether the public interest requires any action upon his part; if he thinks it does not, he can disregard any recommendation that the Interstate Commerce Commission may make. In other words, the Interstate Commerce Commission is powerless to either suspend or modify any rate that the President may make. It is a very skillfully and cunningly concealed stab in the back for the Interstate Commerce Commission, but it is nevertheless fatal. It strikes down this commission and puts it clear out of business.

Thus this great commission that has been stimulating and regulating commerce, that has been investigating the cost of the railroads, that has adjudicated rates in every system, railroad and water, in the United States engaged in interstate commerce, and has at hand in its reports, orders, opinions, findings, and decisions complete data that will enable it quickly to make and adjust any reasonable and proper rate on any railroad or water route in the country, is by this bill simply legislated out of existence, and their power to investigate vested in the President exclusively.

Of course, no one supposes that the President could or would assume or endeavor to make railroad rates. He is engaged in greater things, let us hope, than railroad rates. He is thinking about great international problems, meditating upon the destinies of our people, and deeply and constantly concerned with the great issues of winning this war for America and for liberty.

What must happen, then, is that some new rate-making power must be created to act for him. Is it possible that it is the intention of the party in power to create a new Interstate Commerce Commission or a new set of commissioners and impose upon the taxpayers the expense and cost of an entirely new tribunal, to ascertain and fix rates, and at the same time to permit the Interstate Commerce Commission to continue without work and without jurisdiction still on the public pay roll? If this is the purpose of the bill, the advocates of section 11 ought to be frank enough to say so.

I am opposed to the bill as it stands and in favor of the SWEET amendment, which is to be inserted on page 12 in lieu of the second paragraph beginning at line 12 and ending in the middle of line 8 on page 13. The amendment, proposed by Representative SWEET, of Iowa, simply provides in brief that while the President shall take over and operate the railroads, under the act of August 29, 1916, which states, "The President in time of war is empowered, through the Secretary of War, to take possession and assume control of any system or systems of transportation, or any part thereof, and to utilize the same for the transportation of troops and war materials and equipment, etc.," and further provides that the Interstate Commerce act, approved February 4, 1887, and its amendment approved June 29, 1906, known as the Hepburn Act, shall remain in full force, thereby continuing the Interstate Commerce Commission in full control of the question of determining "fair and just rates," the President's power being limited to the operating of the railroad alone, to the same extent and with the same power, that the railroad companies owning the same had at the time they were taken over, December 28, 1917. This is certainly just and right. Shippers and the general public and the railroad companies all know and understand the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission over their rates; and to disorganize this whole established system by setting up a new tribunal must mean the disorganization of business and the casting away of 30 years of rate-making progress in the United States.

The great criticism that is put up by the committee and the majority Members of this House is that the Interstate Commerce Commission is not quick enough. That is mere subterfuge. This is a mere play on words, it is not borne out by the facts. The Interstate Commerce Commission has acted in many cases for the convenience of companies immediately upon their presentation of a case, although the law requires 30 days' notice to the public of a change of rates; yet this can be waived, and now, when the Government has control of the railroads, which in a way is another way of stating that the public has taken over the railroads, the reason for the 30-day notice entirely disappears, and the commission, out of the abundance of its knowledge, information, and experience as found in its adjudicated cases, can hear and determine at once the question of rates that may be submitted to it during the war.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to urge most earnestly the striking out of the latter part of clause 11 of this bill, and substituting in lieu thereof the amendment proposed by Representative SWEET, of Iowa, which in nowise restricts the power of the President but protects the shipper, the public, and the railroads by retaining the Interstate Commerce Commission in authority with full power to fix and adopt fair, reasonable, and just freight rates during the period of Federal control.

Mr. SIMS. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], a member of the committee.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, let us see for just a minute what this amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET] proposes:

That the jurisdiction and power over the rates, fares, charges, and classification of common carriers which prior to Federal control were lodged in the Interstate Commerce Commission by the act to regulate commerce approved February 4, 1887, and the amendments thereto, shall continue in the Interstate Commerce Commission, and said commission shall retain full jurisdiction over the rates, fares, charges, and classifications of the said carriers and all governmental agencies referred to or created by this act; but during the period of said Federal control said commission, in determining any question arising under this act, shall consider all the facts and circumstances arising under the war emergency and growing out of the unified, coordinated Federal control occasioned thereby. This shall not be construed as interfering with the control by the President or any agency created by him of the operation, as distinguished from the rates, fares, charges, and classifications of said carriers subject to Federal control.

Now, let us see, if the amendment be analyzed, what that means. It has been assumed by some gentlemen—and I agree to that—that under the act of 1916 the President had the power to initiate and fix rates. Under this amendment, if it is adopted, it does not confer upon the Interstate Commerce Commission any power to initiate a rate. It simply retains the jurisdiction they had prior to Federal control, which was merely jurisdiction to approve of any rate that was initiated by the carriers themselves, because there has never been any law authorizing the Interstate Commerce Commission to initiate a rate. As has been so repeatedly stated in this debate, the Interstate Commerce Commission was created to stand between the railroads in their selfish interests and the people, who had the right to depend on the Government for protection.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. Under the provisions of this bill, what remedy is there in the event that the President fixed a rate that was unjust to the shipper? What remedy is there under the bill?

Mr. BARKLEY. The same remedy that would exist in reference to any unjust rate fixed in any other instance. If the President fixes an unjust rate the first step is to make complaint before the Interstate Commerce Commission; they investigate and report back the facts to the President, and the bill makes their finding prima facie evidence of its correctness. Of course, that recommendation will have great weight with the President in determining whether to modify the rate, nullify it, or leave it as it is. But in spite of the recommendations of the Interstate Commerce Commission to the President, the bill does not take away from any citizen or shipper any remedy at law which he may have had prior to the Federal control, if the Interstate Commerce Commission should have approved of an unjust rate.

Mr. DILLON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. DILLON. Would not the determination of the President arise out of the military power of the Government?

Mr. BARKLEY. Not necessarily; the point I am trying to impress upon the committee is that if this amendment is adopted, nobody has the power to initiate a rate.

Mr. DILLON. If the military power of the Government fixes the rate, how are you going to get into the courts?

Mr. BARKLEY. The power to fix a commercial rate is not necessarily a military power. We have conferred on the President by reason of necessity the carrying on of commercial business by the railroads notwithstanding they were taken over for military purposes.

Mr. DILLON. He is to act in this matter as a military power.

Mr. BARKLEY. Not at all. As far as the commercial rates are concerned he is acting as a civil authority and not as a military authority.

Mr. DILLON. He acts partly as a military power and partly as a civil power.

Mr. BARKLEY. Absolutely. He acts in the place of the representative of the railroads, and, on the other hand, as a representative of the people. He occupies a dual capacity.

Mr. DILLON. At the same time he fixes the military and civil rate?

Mr. BARKLEY. His powers are both military and civil. The fact that the war is in progress does not deprive him of his character as a civil officer.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. Does the gentleman think that if the amendment is adopted the President would still have the power to initiate rates as the railroads heretofore have?

Mr. BARKLEY. He has that authority under the act of 1916, and this bill certainly affirms that authority. If the amendment is adopted the president could not initiate a rate.

Mr. DENISON. Why?

Mr. BARKLEY. Because the amendment says, "this shall not be construed as interfering with the control by the President or any agency created by him of the operation as distinguished from the rates, fares, charges, and classifications of said carriers subject to Federal control."

In other words, if this amendment is adopted it takes away from the President the power he got by reason of the authorization to take over the railroads.

Mr. McCORMICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. McCORMICK. If this amendment was amended specifying that the President might initiate a rate subject to the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission, would that satisfy the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. BARKLEY. It would not. I am against it in that form. I am in favor of the provision remaining as it is, because we have attempted not only to coordinate and unify the physical control of the roads, but we are seeking to unify and coordinate the financial control of the railroads. It is manifestly important that the relationship between the income and the outgo shall be maintained as nearly in the same proportion while the Government is controlling these roads as existed prior to their taking over. It seems to me an anomaly that the President is given the undisputed right to increase the expenses of operating these roads, for he may increase the railroad wages, which in all probability will happen, and of course that increases the railway expenses, and yet when it comes to increasing the revenues to take care of these expenses the power to do that is divided and taken away from him and given to the Interstate Commerce Commission. The importance of this would not be so apparent, perhaps, during Federal control, because the Government has a Treasury out of which it may pay any deficit, although I think it is an unwise business policy to increase the expenses of these roads without increasing the income also, so that these additional expenses will be taken care of without direct taxation of the people. But if we do increase the expenses without increasing the rates, and therefore create a deficit in the management of these railroads, when they are turned back to private control they will inherit an increased expense without any increased revenue, and immediately they will flood the Interstate Commerce Commission with a demand for a horizontal raise in all rates in order that they may be able to make up the deficit that the Government handed down to them, and which was created when the Government was in control of them. When that comes at the very period of the ending of the war and the reorganization of all of our industrial relations, it will have a much more baneful effect on business and commerce than to give the President the authority to gradually increase the rates if necessary in order to meet the expenses of the railroads.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. McCORMICK. The companies had the power to increase the expenditures before, but the revenue was limited by the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is true.

Mr. McCORMICK. What, fundamentally, is the reason for changing that relation? The President, in effect, is trusted with their operation. If he must increase the cost of operation, then the same tribunal which found the revenues for an increased cost before will under this amendment find the revenues for an increased cost afterwards.

Mr. BARKLEY. Because under Federal control these railroads are not going to initiate any rates. There is no occasion for them to do it. Their compensation is guaranteed. They are no longer interested in it. Under this amendment the President would be deprived of the authority even to initiate a rate, and the Interstate Commerce Commission inherently can not initiate a rate, so nobody can initiate a rate under this amendment, and there would be no opportunity even for the Interstate Commerce Commission to pass upon it.

Mr. McCORMICK. Then, let me return to my first question: If the gentleman says the President is deprived of the power under this amendment, will not an amendment to the amendment which specifically sets it out remedy the situation?

Mr. BARKLEY. The objection I have is to the policy of robbing the President of the power to increase the revenues. That is an anomalous division of power that ought not to be enacted into law by Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SANDERS].

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, the entire question that is raised in this amendment is whether or not the law, as has been administered in regard to rate making, shall continue or whether we shall initiate a departure therefrom. This is a Government of law and not a Government of executive decrees. I am in favor of giving to the President every bit of power in the world necessary to win this war, and no more. This bill gives to the President all the power of operation. He has complete and absolute control over railroads, over their management, care, service, everything, but I can not get my own consent to vest in the Director General or in the President the power to make rates. Rate making is a science within itself. There is only one governmental agency that we have that knows anything about rate making, and that is the Interstate Commerce Commission. The question naturally arises right at this time, Why should this governmental agency, that knows its business, that knows what effect rates have on industries throughout this land, why should its knowledge and experience be dispensed with during this war emergency?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Now, the railroads at the present time have the right to initiate rates, have they not?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Absolutely.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Would not the gentleman give the President that power subject to review and approval by the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. He absolutely has it.

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is a question on which the gentleman seems to differ from his colleagues on the committee.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. For this reason: To-day under the law the owner of the road, the controller of the road, has the power to initiate rates. Under this bill the President is put in the same position as the owner of the road because he controls the operation of the road. [Applause.] Now, there is no question in the world that he has, and ought to have, the power to initiate rates, but there is likewise, in my opinion, no question but what that right should not become effective until the only governmental agency in America that knows anything about the science of rate making, that knows anything about rate making in relation to the railroads, the shipper and the people shall have passed upon that rate and shall have given it the sanction of the governmental agency which the people created in order to stand between them and the selfish interest of the railroads. [Applause.]

Mr. ALEXANDER. But would he have that power if the Sweet amendment is agreed to in its present form?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. I think so.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. If I can have five minutes I would like to yield to the gentleman and answer any question that I possibly can.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have not the time or I would be very glad to yield to the gentleman all the time he wants, but I do not want to take up his five minutes in asking questions.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Go ahead.

Mr. BARKLEY. I was going to ask the gentleman if he paid careful attention to the reading of the latter part of the gentleman's amendment, which distinctly stated that the President is not to be interfered with so far as the physical operation of the roads is concerned——

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Yes; I have read it over carefully.

Mr. ALEXANDER. But so far as the financial operation is concerned, there are restrictions——

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Oh, I have read it, and I have studied it, and I believe I understand it; and I know this about the amendment offered: That it means what it says, and I know that the paragraph of the bill that is sought to be amended is nothing but legislative camouflage. [Applause.] It says a whole lot and means nothing, except that it takes away from the Interstate Commerce Commission the power now conferred by law, and that it does away with that principle of rail-rate control which the people of this country have contended for until it was finally written into law, and which the gentleman and others are now seeking to wipe from the statute books. [Applause.]

Mr. ESCH. Will the gentleman use some of his time?

Mr. SIMS. How much more time has the gentleman which he feels he is compelled to use?

Mr. ESCH. All of it. How much have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 17 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Tennessee 23 minutes.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. CALDWELL. I would like to make a point of no quorum, if we are going to have a vote to-night. If we are not, I withdraw the point.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not inform the gentleman.

Mr. CALDWELL. I withdraw the point of no quorum.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I have had a good deal of sympathy with much of the dissatisfaction of the past few years over some charges that the Interstate Commerce Commission had not dealt as fairly as it might have dealt with the railroads. I have had a good many letters from business men who have thought that the Interstate Commerce Commission had broken down, and they asked that it be abolished. In other words, I recognize fully that there has been a movement throughout the country generally antagonistic to the continuance of the Interstate Commerce Commission. When such movement comes up openly for decision upon its merits it will be fully considered. And I stated a moment ago that I had some sympathy with the complaint that the railroads had not been treated fairly on questions of the increase of rates. However, I am not ready now to say that this commission shall be emasculated in this way. Here is an opportunity that is afforded under the stress of war to eliminate the Interstate Commerce Commission. It is hoped to put it out of business, a hope long entertained by certain of our people, but down to this day little chance to do so. There is no doubt about it, and it is done under the charge that in time of war, in order to be effective, we must make this modification. The old play to use the war for every cause whose success is desired. Now, I can not be a party to that. I think that the Interstate Commerce Commission is an institution which is to-day probably the greatest body of scientific investigation on questions of rate making that is known anywhere in the world. It has built up a body of thought difficult to duplicate.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I will.

Mr. BORLAND. Does the gentleman understand, as I do, that this bill was drawn by the aid of a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and does the gentleman use the words "emasculate the commission" with knowledge of that fact in his mind?

Mr. FESS. I do not want to assume that either a member of the commission or the commission itself is responsible for this bill, notwithstanding the active part Mr. Anderson has had in the drafting of the measure.

Mr. BARKLEY. If the gentleman will allow me to make the suggestion, I could tell him that a member of the commission drew it, with the approval of the commission.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. May I interrupt the gentleman a moment?

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not mean to suggest that the commission as a commission drafted it.

Mr. FESS. There is no doubt that this effort to modify rate making and take it out of the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission and put it in the hands of some other person is designedly to eliminate ultimately the Interstate Commerce Commission. There is no doubt about that. The powers back of the proposal are those who are now and have been antagonistic to the commission.

Mr. BARKLEY. There is no basis in fact for that idea.

Mr. FESS. There is no doubt about that. There is a campaign, of long standing, that I have noticed—and as I said before, I have had some sympathy with it—on the part of the railroads, which complain that they had not been treated on the question of the increase of rates as they thought they ought to be treated, and of course they would rather leave this to some other body or authority than the commission that they thought heretofore had not been favorable to them in the matter of increase of rates; and this purpose is none other than to take a step, under stress of war, to eliminate that body as a rate-making power and put it in the hands of some other person, namely, either the President or the Director General.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes; I yield to my colleague.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Even if it were not true that this bill was written by the Interstate Commerce Commission, is it not about time that Congress was beginning to write its own bills?

Mr. FESS. Yes. I certainly agree on that point.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. And how about the Committee on Ways and Means?

Mr. FESS. I mentioned that fact a moment ago, that I did not want to assume that a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission or the commission itself wrote this bill. I do think, I am frank to say, that this body is suffering from a state of decay approaching atrophy simply because we have gotten into the habit of letting some outside authority hand down a bill here and tell us to ratify it without any special consideration. [Applause.] I did not want to charge that somebody outside of this body is entirely responsible for the writing of this measure, but since members of the committee have openly admitted it, it does not change the fact in the case that we are here taking a step to emasculate the only rate-making body that has a standing, which it has built up through a series of investigations of all phases of the railroad question covering a period of 30 years. I do not intend to be a party to that emasculation, under the stress of war, and thereby take a step which if proposed at any other time would be repudiated, and I shall vote for the amendment which retains the rate-fixing function with the existing authority for that purpose. [Applause.]

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I want to say, in the first place, that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] is absolutely and clearly wrong in his construction of the Sweet amendment, or else he is wrong as to his conclusion regarding the powers that the President now has. The Sweet amendment leaves the President exactly the same power that he now has, except the final power of making rates.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman point out in this Sweet amendment any provision authorizing the President to initiate rates?

Mr. LENROOT. I will answer the question. The President does not get his power to initiate rates from this bill. He gets it from the act of August 29, 1916, which places him in the same position that the railway president or manager is in; and no one has claimed, unless it be the gentleman from Kentucky, that the President has not the power to initiate rates in the same way that the railroad officials could initiate them before the Government took over control of the railroads. Of course, he has that power. The question is whether he has the power to make final rates, and that is the only question that the Sweet amendment deals with.

Now, the arguments of all the gentlemen on that side goes upon entirely false premises. You have been very tender of the rights of the railroads in this bill. You have been very careful that they shall have full compensation. But you of the majority now propose to ignore absolutely any rights of the shipper. I want to say to you on that side that the shipper has rights in this business as well as the railroad companies.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. LENROOT. No; I can not yield. You have ignored them. You yourselves, man after man, have said that the reason why you want the President to have the right to overrule the Interstate Commerce Commission is because, perhaps, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] said, the President ought to have money to purchase securities of the railroads.

Do you want to take the position that you have the right to raise the rate to the shippers in order that railroad bonds and stocks shall be purchased by the President? The gentleman from Pennsylvania pointed to the example of England, where they raised passenger rates in order to discourage traffic. Will you tell me what right under the Constitution of the United States the Government has to raise passenger rates so that you may take my property, take money out of my pocket, for traveling upon the railroad in order that some one else may not travel?

But the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] found fault with the question that I asked him and said I was unfair. The gentleman from Pennsylvania made the statement that the President might need to increase rates in order to purchase railroad securities. I asked him whether we had any power to enable the President to raise rates for any such purpose. I say we have not. There is one fundamental proposition in all rates. The shipper is entitled to have his commodity carried on a railroad upon such terms and no higher terms than will pay a fair return upon the value of the property. Whenever you exact from the shipper one penny more than that you are taking his property without just compensation, just the same as if you attempt to take the use of railroads without giving the owners just compensation.

Mr. Chairman, this is the first time since I have been a Member of Congress that I have seen railroad officials aiding a committee of this House to secure the passage of a bill in this form; and the railroads or the larger systems, as we know—and we might as well make no secret of it—are doing everything to assist the majority of the committee in keeping this provision in the bill as it now stands. And why? Because they expect that the President will raise the rates when the Interstate Commerce Commission would not, so that after this war is over and the roads are again turned back into the hands of the railroads these increased rates shall still prevail. They talk about raising the wages of railroad men, the $60,000,000 increase under the Adamson law. Why were not the rates raised because of that? Because the income of the railroads was sufficient without raising the rates. And if the President now shall increase the wages of railroad employees, it does not follow that rates should be increased. That will depend upon whether their income then justifies it or not.

Mr. SIMS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS].

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee if we are to have a vote to-night?

Mr. SIMS. Just help us defeat this amendment.

Mr. AUSTIN. I want a direct answer. Are we going to have an opportunity to vote on this amendment to-night?

Mr. SIMS. You certainly are, if I can give it to you.

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Chairman, I think it will lead us all to a clearer understanding of the question now presented if we keep constantly in mind the contract that is provided for in this bill. This bill authorizes the President to make contracts with these railroads and to fix the compensation within the limits prescribed by the bill. When the President of the United States affixes his signature to this contract—a contract to which the Interstate Commerce Commission is in no sense a party—it becomes the contract of the Nation. It is not the contract of the manufacturers of the East. It is not the contract of the cotton growers of the South. It is not the contract of the wheat and corn growers of the West. It is not the contract of a combination of shippers and their paid attorneys, but it becomes the contract of 110,000,000 people who are heart and soul behind the President in the successful prosecution of this war. [Applause.]

Now, what will be the situation if this amendment prevails? The President will control the operating expenses during Federal control and the Interstate Commerce Commission will control the operating revenues. In other words, you put the Interstate Commerce Commission at the intake pipe and leave the President of the United States at the spigot. And they seek to justify this serious division of authority by eulogizing the Interstate Commerce Commission. No Member upon the floor of this House has a higher regard for the Interstate Commerce Commission than I have. I freely acknowledge all their virtues and all their accomplishments; but the trouble with our friends upon the other side is that they are talking in terms of peace when we are in the midst of war. But they say, "Oh, it is too much power to give to any living man." And yet we have freely given the President power over ten millions of American boys. We have given him the power to go into every home in the land. We have given him the power to send these boys against the enemy on land, in the air, or under the sea. We have made him controller of the destinies, the hopes, the aspirations, and the lives of these boys. Yet when it comes to a question of giving him authority to fix the rates on such a sacred thing as inanimate freight, these gentlemen pause and say that it is too much power to give to any one man. [Applause.]

I submit, gentlemen of the House, the control of this question ought to be left to the President, to be exercised whenever in his judgment the interests of the Nation require it. I submit to you that on the determination of this rate will depend the success or failure of the operation of these roads during the period of the war. For my part, I am willing to trust to him the exercise of this power as his judgment may dictate, and so far as deciding whether I will follow the Executive or follow the shippers of the West and their paid attorneys, I choose to follow the President of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. How much time is remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee has 17 minutes and the gentleman from Wisconsin 7 minutes.

Mr. LONGWORTH I would like to call attention to the fact that we made the agreement to limit debate at about quarter past 3.

The CHAIRMAN. The debate actually began, as the Chair noticed, at half past 3. We began the discussion of the agreement at a quarter past 3. The time has been kept very accurately.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I expressed my views so fully in general debate that I do not care to again address the committee. I am willing to have a vote now.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STEVENSON: Page 12, beginning with line 12, strike out all down to and including the word "interest" in line 8, page 13, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That during the period of Federal control whenever in his opinion the public interest requires the President may initiate rates by filing the same with the Interstate Commerce Commission. Said rates shall be fair, reasonable, and just, and shall take effect at such time and upon such notice as he may direct, but the Interstate Commerce Commission shall, upon complaint, enter upon a hearing concerning the justness and reasonableness of so much of any order of the President as establishes or changes any rate, fare, charge, or classification of any carrier under Federal control, and may consider all the facts and circumstances existing at the time of the making of the rate. After full hearing the commission may make such findings and orders as are authorized by the act to regulate commerce as amended."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina as a substitute.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. STEVENSON) there were 16 ayes and 89 noes.

So the amendment by way of a substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SWEET) there were 83 ayes and 90 noes.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET] to act as tellers.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, there were many gentlemen who were very anxious to leave, and I promised them that if they would wait and let us have a vote, if tellers were demanded I would move to rise. I therefore move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the vote was being taken by tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion to rise is always in order.

The question was taken, and the committee determined to rise.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9685) for the operation of transportation systems under Federal control and had come to no resolution thereon.

PORTO RICO (S. DOC. NO. 185).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, ordered printed without the documents, and referred to the Committee on Insular Affairs:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

As required by section 23 of the act of Congress approved March 2, 1917, entitled "An act to provide a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes," I transmit herewith copies of the acts and resolutions enacted by the Ninth Legislature of Porto Rico during its first session (August 13 to November 26, 1917, inclusive).

These acts and resolutions have not previously been transmitted to Congress.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 25, 1918.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has received from the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FULLER] a letter resigning his membership on the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department. Without objection, the resignation is accepted.

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, there is a special order to-morrow, it being Calendar Wednesday, and I ask unanimous consent that when that special order is disposed of we take up the railroad bill for further consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that after the alien-slacker bill is disposed of to-morrow the railroad bill shall be considered, notwithstanding the rule as to Calendar Wednesday. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I object.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 37 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, February 27, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. CALDWELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 27, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we seek Thy guidance for the duties of this day. Look upon us as an organized society. Bless every department of our National Government. We pray Thee, through Thy grace, Thy wisdom and direction, that every department may be so coordinated as that there may be at the center of it a great heart and a great mind expressive of the highest aspirations and the broadest and deepest thought of the people of this land.

We lift our hearts to Thee and pray that Thy blessing may rest upon those who abide under the shadow of a great sorrow; that Thy grace and presence may comfort and cheer them; that all who are put to the test, the uttermost test, of sorrow and of distress in this life may find in the companionship of God their solace and their comfort. Save us out of all our distresses and fit us for an everlasting life. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. LODGE and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

POLITICAL ACTIVITIES.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I present a clipping from a newspaper for the authenticity of which I vouch. It shows that the activities of certain Republican authorities which have been regarded as quasi criminal by some gentlemen who have commented on them are not confined to Republicans, but our Democratic brethren show great signs of activity in various parts of the country in organizing for a partisan campaign. I ask that this clipping from a newspaper be published in the RECORD that Senators who indulge in the criticisms may at their leisure digest and absorb this item.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks that the clipping which he has sent to the desk be published in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the clipping was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEMOCRATIC NATIONAL LEADERS PRACTICE PARTISANSHIP THEY DECRY IN THE REPUBLICAN PARTY IN THE MIDST OF FOREIGN WAR.

STATEMENT GIVEN OUT OCTOBER 16, 1917.

While the cry is being raised that Republicans should at this time entirely forget the interests of their party, on the assumption that Republican activity at this time is unpatriotic, the Democratic national organization is active to an unprecedented degree. The chairman of the Democratic national committee is Vance McCormick, recently named by President Wilson chairman of the national export council. His presence in Washington seems to have stimulated Democratic national activities. Some 40 employees are busy at Democratic national headquarters in the Woodward Building at Washington. The following bulletin was recently put out by the Democratic national committee, showing what the Democratic leaders are doing while they are decrying Republican organization activity as "unpatriotic":

"WASHINGTON, October 16.

"A regional system of organization recently adopted by the executive committee of the Democratic national committee for use in the future campaigns will be considered at a series of zone meetings to be held in various parts of the country, beginning this week.

"The first meeting will be held at the Brown Palace Hotel in Denver on Wednesday, October 17, and the second at the Parker House in Boston next Monday, October 22. Dates of the other meetings will be announced later.

"The plan is to organize the national committee into eight subcommittees, each of which will choose its regional chairman and perhaps establish zone headquarters.

"W. R. Hollister, assistant secretary, and W. D. Jamieson, assistant treasurer of the national committee, who are the directors of the permanent Democratic national organization in Washington, will attend the regional meeting and consult with the national committeemen and State chairmen in the different zones.

"Following is the system under which the country has been divided under the new plan, which establishes an innovation in major political party management:

"Zone 1: Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, and Vermont.

"Zone 2: Connecticut, New Jersey, New York, and Porto Rico.

"Zone 3: Delaware, District of Columbia, Maryland, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Virginia, and West Virginia.

"Zone 4: Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, North Dakota, South Dakota, and Wisconsin.

"Zone 5: Alabama, Florida, Georgia, and North Carolina.

"Zone 6: Arkansas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Oklahoma, Tennessee, and Texas.

"Zone 7: Colorado, Idaho, Montana, New Mexico, Utah, and Wyoming.

"Zone 8: Alaska, Arizona, California, Hawaii, Nevada, Oregon, Philippines, and Washington.

"National committeemen representing the States and Territories in the various zones, under the new system, will cooperate in the direction of future campaigns in their respective regions, while all of the subcommittees will operate under the supervision of the permanent headquarters of the national committee in Washington.

"Under this announced plan meetings are being held throughout the country preliminary to the congressional campaign of 1918 by Democratic leaders. The following account of a meeting held in New England, taken from the Boston Globe of October 23, is typical:

"'Prominent Democrats representing State and national organizations of New England met at the Parker House yesterday and formed an organization which, it is believed, will enable the Democrats of New England to look after local political affairs and present their needs to the national organization of the party more effectively than in the past. New England headquarters will probably be opened in Boston before the opening of the congressional campaign of 1918.

"'The New England district, the second to be organized, consists of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island. At the meeting to-day Dr. John W. Coughlin, of Fall River, was elected chairman and Francis E. Sullivan, of Providence, secretary.

"'Those present were Senator HENRY F. HOLLIS, and Alexander Murchie, of New Hampshire; William R. Pattangall, of Maine; Francis E. Sullivan, chairman of the Rhode Island State committee; Patrick H. Quinn, the Connecticut member of the Democratic national committee; James E. Kennely, the Vermont member of the national committee; Michael A. O'Leary, chairman of the Massachusetts State committee; Marcus A. Coolidge, of Fitchburg; and W. R. Hollister, assistant secretary of the Democratic national committee.'"

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. BECKHAM. I present a communication in the nature of a memorial from citizens of Clay County, Ky., which I ask to have printed in the RECORD, omitting the signatures, and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GARRARD, CLAY COUNTY, KY.,
February 19, 1918.

Hon. J. C. W. BECKHAM,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: We the undersigned unite in asking you to use all your influence to have the new postal rates on second-class matter repealed. We do not see why the cost of mailing a magazine or newspaper should be made burdensome for those far away from the place of publication while near-by readers escape.

Is it not true that the Postal Department shows a surplus even with the present rates on second-class matter? And how is it then in Canada, with only 6,000,000 people, second-class postal rates are just half of what they are in the United States and yet the Canadian Post Office operates at a profit? It seems like an unjust imposition to us to tack this zone-system clause on to a war-revenue bill. By means of magazines and newspapers we learn how best to serve our country in this her hour of need of every citizen, man and woman.

Please do all in your power to have this zone-system clause repealed when Congress convenes.

Yours, very truly, Mrs. NELLIE L. HORTON,
(And others).

Names are coming in daily over the phone or signed once to be used on three letters—two Senators and one Congressman—so I have had to copy the names. Yours for victory through justice to all.

Mr. NELSON presented a petition of sundry citizens of Viking, Minn., and a petition of sundry citizens of Fisher, Minn., praying for an increase in the amount of tax on excess war profits to a larger extent than provided in the revenue bill, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. KENYON presented a petition of sundry citizens of Marion, Iowa, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the manufacture and sale of all alcoholic stimulants, including wine and beer, during the war, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS.

Mr. PENROSE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 3399) to amend an act approved May 27, 1908 (35 Stats., pp. 417, 418), and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 290) thereon.

Mr. POINDEXTER, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 180) granting an honorable discharge to Owen S. Willey, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 291) thereon.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 3125) for the relief of certain enlisted men of the United States Navy, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 292) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. NEW:

A bill (S. 3971) granting a pension to James K. Waltermire (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. KENYON:

A bill (S. 3972) granting an increase of pension to James F. Byard (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. POINDEXTER:

A bill (S. 3973) to authorize the Supreme Court to prescribe forms and rules, and generally to regulate pleading, procedure, and practice on the common-law side of the Federal courts; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (S. 3974) granting a pension to Margaret E. Gibboney (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. TOWNSEND:

A bill (S. 3975) granting a pension to Nathan L. Brass (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 3976) granting a pension to John F. Jackson (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

WAR FINANCE CORPORATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. SAULSBURY) submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3714) to provide further for the national security and defense, and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to provide credits for industries and enterprises in the United States necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—EDWIN MARVIN CARTER.

On motion of Mr. SMITH of Georgia, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Senate bill 8036, Sixty-fourth Congress, granting a pension to Edward Marvin Carter, be withdrawn, no adverse report having been made thereon.

PROTECTION OF SOLDIERS AND SAILORS' CIVIL RIGHTS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. OVERMAN. I submit a report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon House bill 6361, and I ask for its adoption.

Mr. SIMMONS. If my colleague will permit me, I should like to call his attention to the fact that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] gave notice that he would address the Senate this morning.

Mr. OVERMAN. Then I will merely submit the report. If there is objection to its consideration now, of course I will ask that it go over to be taken up at some other time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The request of the Senator from North Carolina will be complied with.

The conference report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6361) to extend protection to the civil rights of members of the Military and Naval Establishments of the United States engaged in the present war having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 4, 6, 11, 12, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, and 28.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 7, 8, 9, 10, 14, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 27, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 42, and 43, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "Army field clerks; field clerks, Quartermaster Corps; civilian clerks and employees on duty with the military forces detailed for service abroad in accordance with provisions of existing law"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "or against a person secondarily liable under such right"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 103. Whenever pursuant to any of the provisions of this act the enforcement of any obligation or liability, the prosecution of any suit or proceeding, the entry or enforcement of any order, writ, judgment, or decree, or the performance of any other act, may be stayed, postponed, or suspended, such stay, postponement, or suspension may in the discretion of the court likewise be granted to sureties, guarantors, indorsers, and others subject to the obligation or liability, the performance or enforcement of which is stayed, postponed, or suspended.

"When a judgment or decree is vacated or set aside in whole or in part as provided in this act, the same may in the discretion of the court likewise be set aside and vacated as to any surety, guarantor, indorser, or other person liable upon the contract or liability for the enforcement of which the judgment or decree was entered."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 13, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the word "chiefly"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 15, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken out and the matter inserted by said amendment, strike out the following in lines 10, 11, 12, 13, and 14, page 13: ", and in all cases where under the terms of the contract of insurance any person other than the insured has a vested interest therein the consent of such other person shall be included in such application"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 40, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 1, page 18, after the word "settlement" insert the words "or payment of dividend"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 41, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "Before any dividend is paid or any loan or settlement is made the written consent of the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance must be obtained"; and the Senate agree to the same.

SHORTAGE OF COAL AND SUGAR.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is closed.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. NELSON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The absence of a quorum is suggested, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hollis	Nelson	Shields
Bankhead	Johnson, S. Dak.	New	Simmons
Beckham	Jones, N. Mex.	Norris	Smith, Ga.
Brandegee	Jones, Wash.	Nugent	Smith, Mich.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I desire to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. FLETCHER] on official business.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce the absence of the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] on account of the death of his wife. I need not say that he has the sympathy of all Senators in his great bereavement.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], owing to illness.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-seven Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The Senator from Massachusetts will proceed.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to discuss at no greater length than is absolutely necessary the testimony taken by the subcommittee of the Committee on Manufactures in regard to the shortage of sugar and coal pursuant to Senate resolution 163. When I introduced the resolution I was spurred thereto by conditions in that portion of the country which I in part represent. But I also rested my action on far broader grounds which sustain and justify all the investigations and inquiries ordered and held by the Senate and the House. My action was based on the principle laid down by the elder Pitt in 1740, when he said in the House of Commons:

> Our time can not be more usefully employed during a war than in examining how it has been conducted, and settling the degrees of confidence that may be reposed in those to whose care are intrusted our reputation, our fortunes, and our lives.
>
> There is not any inquiry, sir, of more importance than this; it is not a question about an uncertain privilege or a law which, if found inconvenient, may hereafter be repealed. We are now to examine whether it is probable that we shall preserve our commerce and our independence, or whether we are sinking into subjection to a foreign power.
> But this inquiry, sir, will produce no great information if those whose conduct is examined are allowed to select the evidence, for what accounts will they exhibit but such as have often already been laid before us, and such as they now offer without concern? Accounts, obscure and fallacious, imperfect and confused, from which nothing can be learned, and which can never entitle the minister to praise, though they may screen him from punishment.

The subcommittee began its hearings on the 12th day of December, 1917. Those hearings were continued until January 23, 1918. The subcommittee sat all through the holidays and during the period which elapsed between the first hearing and the last they were in session nearly every day, and generally all day, and took testimony which fills some 2,000 pages. It is not my intention to weary the Senate with tables of figures or with long citations from this mass of testimony. I intend merely to set forth the conclusions at which I have arrived after hearing the witnesses and giving to the subject many hours of thought and consideration. The general facts upon which I base my conclusions are all to be found in the evidence and in no case, so far as the facts are concerned, have I gone outside the record.

Before entering upon a discussion of the policy adopted during the past year in regard to the production, price, and distribution of sugar and coal it seems to me that we ought to recall and have clearly in our minds the general economic conditions of the world which existed prior to the war in Europe and also the same economic conditions, as changed by the war, between August, 1914, and April, 1917. Following the Spanish War there came a period of very great prosperity not only in this country but throughout the civilized world. Coincident, roughly speaking, with this period of prosperity began a general advance in prices and consequently in the cost of living. This advance in prices continued until the beginning of the war, in August, 1914. I do not draw a line at this point because the advance in prices ceased but because there was then a new and violent change in economic conditions. During this period, extending from the end of the last century to 1914 and covering practically fifteen years, there were, of course, fluctuations, but the general movement of prices with few exceptions was steadily upward. In this country, at least, strong efforts were made to check the advance in the cost of living by legislation, such as the regulation of railroad rates, better enforcement of the laws against trusts and combinations, and severe tariff reductions. Despite these attempts to lower prices by law and despite the occurrence of a serious business depression in 1907, the level of prices continued to advance. This fact indicates that there were fundamental economic causes at work which were carrying prices upward and which could not be permanently checked either by business depression or by the artifices of legislation. One of these causes no doubt was to be found in the period of prosperity itself, which was accompanied by increased profits and advancing wages, conditions which always produce among all classes of the community a general willingness to spend more and a general desire to live better. This increased expenditure, of course, must move, and always has moved, prices upward. It has been very obvious, for example, in the matter of the consumption of meat. More than ten years ago it was pointed out by authorities upon the subject that the consumption of meat was outrunning the increase in edible animals. Having more money to spend, people ate more meat and better meat, and ate it oftener. What is true of meat is equally true of all other articles which enter into the cost of living.

Another and far more powerful influence was the increase in the circulating medium. It is not necessary to stop to discuss the quantitative theory of money, because, whether that theory be sound or not, there can be no question that if the circulating medium increases beyond the normal demands and the legitimate necessities of the community it is certain to advance prices. The advance may be made violently by huge issues of irredeemable paper, as happened in the French Revolution as well as in our own, and both in the South and North at the time of our Civil War, or it may come gradually by a disproportionate increase of the circulating medium through natural causes.

Let me briefly call attention to the increase in credits and in the circulating medium, for we are apt to forget it. In 1879 the circulation of the United States in all forms was $16.92 per capita. January 1, 1918, it was $48.76 as against $43 in 1917, an advance of $5.76 per capita in one year. These figures tell their own story. The world's annual gold production in 1896, just on the eve of the period of prosperity, was $202,251,600. In 1915 the world's gold production on a yearly ascending scale was $470,466,214, the largest ever known. It will be seen from these few figures that there has been an immense increase in the world supply of gold, to go no further, and as gold is the foundation of circulation and the standard of all civilized countries it brought with it an enormous expansion of credits and of currency based on gold. If the medium of exchange cheapens by becoming too plentiful, prices are certain to advance, just as they are certain to decline if the circulating medium is unduly contracted and becomes correspondingly dear.

Other causes may have been at work, but it is sufficient to mention these two, and neither of these was a cause which could be dealt with by the artifices of legislation or could be checked more than temporarily by the fluctuations of business. To show what the advance in prices has been, I present the following table:

Percentages of decrease and increase in wholesale prices of farm and food products, 1900 to 1910, plane of 1900 prices.

DECREASE.	Per cent.
Molasses	22.4
Raisins	19.5
Sugar	7.0

INCREASE.	Per cent.
Potatoes	14.4
Beans	14.4
Prunes	19.7
Codfish	21.4
Onions	22.1
Bread	25.0
Sugar beets	26.8
Fresh beef	27.7
Rye flour	29.1
Milk	34.3
Cattle and sheep	34.4
Evaporated apples	35.9
Butter	36.7
Cheese	39.4
Wheat flour	43.0
Herring	43.9
Timothy hay	49.3
Barley	49.5
Salt beef	49.7
Rye	50.2
Mutton	51.9
Corn meal	52.4
Corn	52.5
Wheat	55.9
Cotton	57.3
Hams	60.4
Eggs	64.8
Oats	69.8
Hogs	76.0
Bacon	77.1
Lard	81.6
Salt pork	89.8

It will be observed that in this long list, embracing almost every article of food, there were only three articles which decreased in price during that period, namely, molasses, which decreased 22.4 per cent; raisins, which decreased 19.5 per cent; and sugar, which decreased 7 per cent.

This table does not come down to date, but it shows the course of prices for the first decade of the century, and since that date there has been no change in the general price movement. Anyone who will take the trouble to look at the reports on wholesale and retail prices just published by the Bureau of Labor Statistics will find that the average retail prices for food, on the basis of 100 in 1916, rose from 82 in 1910 to 90 in 1914, and that in wholesale prices the movement of commodities from 1910 was upward, except in the year 1911, when there was a slight falling off.

Such, then, was the economic situation in regard to prices, which had existed for some fifteen years, when the war broke out in Europe. That war brought with it a necessary reduction of the purchasing power of the nations involved, but this effect, tending to lower prices, was gradual in its operation and, although it will undoubtedly be felt with intense severity after the close of the war, it has thus far in no degree offset the other effects which the war produced. Millions of men—it has been estimated as many as 40,000,000—were taken by the war in the course of three years from the class of producers and were converted into consumers. Other millions were taken from reproductive industries and forced into industries wholly nonproductive; that is, industries which were engaged in making shells and explosives, for example, which were immediately destroyed and which, of course, earned nothing. This absorption of millions of men in war and war industries produced inevitably a great shortage of labor in all the ordinary and reproductive occupations. There could be no more powerful cause than this for a violent advance in prices, and this movement was still further accelerated by the increase of the circulating medium in Europe through the issue of paper currency and the expansion of national credits, and in this country by the pouring in of enormous quantities of gold to pay for the purchases made here by the belligerent nations. The general upward movement of prices, therefore, which had been going on steadily before the war was greatly and abnormally quickened by the unnatural effects of war conditions.

This was the situation which confronted us when we entered the war last April, and when we undertook to check the operation of these great economic forces by the artificial and arbitrary methods of law and by executive action. It was proposed to reduce prices in spite of the overwhelming economic forces which were working always steadily and relentlessly toward their advance and at the same time to stimulate production. Nothing could be more desirable than both these purposes, but there was much doubt in the minds of those who reflected upon these subjects whether such an experiment as this could possibly succeed. The artificial regulation and fixing of prices have been tried over and over again in the past and history shows only a record of failure in the attempts. In this war price fixing was tried both in France and Germany, and in both cases, if we may judge from the best authorities and from the admissions made, the attempt was a failure.

In this connection I am going to cite Gustave Le Bon, who is one of the great scientific men of France, a distinguished biologist and also a publicist. Some of his books on psychology are very well known—for instance, one which he wrote some years ago, which was translated into many languages, called "The Psychology of the Crowd." He wrote another book called "The Psychology of Education," and another "The Psychology of Politics," and still another "Of Socialism." He has made a very elaborate study of the mental operations of masses of men in contradistinction to the individual mind. He has published recently another book, "Les Premieres Conséquences de la Guerre," in which he collects data on the psychologic conditions of the nations engaged in war. Among the many things operating upon the public mind of which Mr. Le Bon treats is the price fixing which took place in France and in this country at the close of the eighteenth century. He lays great emphasis on the reversion to the old ideas of the French Revolution, and he points out in his citations of authorities the effects on the price of sugar, among other articles, both in France and in Germany. The authorities he cites all seem to show that price fixing was not successful and was in a large measure abandoned in both countries.

While Mr. Hoover was on the stand I had some discussion with him about price fixing in Europe, and he thought it had gone somewhat further and had rather more success than I had stated, but it appeared when we went into the details that there were very few articles, if any, where the Government had fixed the price without either taking possession of the product or sufficient control of it to regulate the price by their ownership; that is, by the familiar method of monopoly. This is a different situation from naked price fixing with the commodity left in the market to be dealt with in the usual way. I quote briefly from the testimony so that without going into it elaborately I may give the substance of the points which Mr. Hoover and I discussed:

Senator LODGE. In the hearing before the Agricultural Committee you say that a maximum price has proved a total failure in Europe in every case except where the Government owned enough of the commodity to control the market.

Mr. HOOVER. I believe that is the case, but price fixing is capable of a great deal of definition by way of nomenclature. Maximum prices, I do not think, have an effect—that is, the simple regulation that a price shall not exceed a certain amount. On the other hand, in the organized control of the distribution of a commodity it may be necessary to agree on a maximum-profit base in order to prevent profiteering, but it must be backed by some other engine than pure legal definition of price by regulation. (Hearings, p. 583.)

I must pause here a moment to make clear the distinction of which I have spoken between the regulation and establishment of prices by artificial means of general application to the trade and commerce of a country and such action as was taken by the British Government, for example, in regard to wheat. There, as I understand, the British Government bought up the wheat—certainly all the imported wheat—and then sold it to the people at a fixed price, below the market price, making up the advance from the treasury to the extent, as I am informed, of $200,000,000. In that case the true price was the market price, but the Government became the largest if not the only purchaser and sold wheat to the people at a loss, the difference being made up, as I have said, out of the treasury—in other words, out of the money of the people taken from them by taxation instead of over the counter of the dealer. This may or may not have been beneficial and wise, but it did not involve an artificial fixing of prices in the operations of business. It only illustrated the truth of the fact that in this disagreeable world it is not possible, as a rule, to get something for nothing—a desire which is strong in the hearts of humanity, which people insist on believing to be possible, and which has led the race into more economic pitfalls than any of the many will-o'-the-wisps which mankind is delighted to follow in its childlike faith that it is possible to find gold pieces in the gutters and take money from the air. In the English case the money came out of the consumer, from whom it must always ultimately come, the only difference being that it was taken from him in the disguised form of taxation. The fixing of prices simultaneously with the stimulation of production, which was the enterprise we undertook in the United States, was of an entirely different nature. It proceeded on the pleasant theory that high and advancing prices were not due to deep and irresistible economic causes but were wholly owing to the fact that somebody was making undue profits. Undoubtedly there were people who were making exorbitant profits, but this was not the case with the great volume of business. Profits on an advancing market were good, but they were kept within bounds by corresponding advances in the wages of labor and in all running expenses, as well as by the good sense and intelligence of the mass of those engaged in business. The theory which we as a Government seem to have adopted, that the advance in prices and the high cost of living were due to those persons who were making exorbitant profits, was fatally defective, as any theory must be which is based on exceptions and not on the general rule established by the vast majority of facts and cases. Assuming, for the sake of argument, that all persons who, either honestly or dishonestly, were making large or undue profits, were wholly vicious, and that we swept them out of existence, it would have had as little effect upon the general course of prices under existing conditions as the killing of a few ground sharks or dogfish would have upon the destruction of edible fishes, which is due to the reckless improvidence of civilized mankind. Killing the dogfish would be helpful, no doubt, but it would not avert the fatal reduction and eventual extinction of the food fishes, which is owing to larger and more powerful forces. The slaughter of all makers of undue profits would undoubtedly check speculation and tend to give stability to prices, but it would not stop their advance, which arises from fundamental and universal economic causes which can not be suppressed by laws or decrees or even by lungs and language. However, we entered upon the experiment of reducing prices and at the same time increasing production with general acclaim, except from skeptical persons, who doubted the power of man by statutes or executive orders to overthrow natural laws, and who for obvious reasons held their peace when the search for the new Eldorado began. Since then months have elapsed, and the time has come when we can profitably discuss the efforts which have been made to reduce prices and at the same time stimulate production by laws and decrees.

Briefly, then, I wish to consider the results of the experiment in the case of sugar and coal in the order in which I have named them.

In the general review which I have given of prices it will be noted that sugar was one of the three articles which had not risen in the first decade of the century, showing that the world's supply of sugar was in advance of the world's demand. This situation was, of course, completely revolutionized by the war. From the sugar market of the world the war took at once all the beet sugars of the central powers, confining their consumption to Germany and Austria. The Russian supply—and there was said to be a large surplus of sugar in Russia—was excluded from the market of the western nations by the practical cutting off of opportunities for transportation. The Belgian crop of beet sugar was also largely reduced, and so was the French crop. England, therefore, which depended entirely upon outside sources and which had taken large amounts of sugar from the Continent of Europe, was thrown back on the Western Hemisphere, which included her own West Indian Islands, and upon the product of the East Indies, which came chiefly from Java. At the very beginning of the war the English Government bought up large quantities of sugar both in Java and in the West Indies, but as the war went on transportation became more and more difficult as tonnage diminished and when we entered the war and began to deal with the sugar question it may be said broadly that the Java supply was inaccessible. During the past year there has been something like 900,000 tons of sugar in Java, but it has not been found possible to move it; and there is also some sugar in the Philippines and perhaps an inconsiderable amount in other quarters in the East Indies. These conditions forced England, France, and Italy into the American field, and the chief burden fell upon what may be called the field of the United States, which includes Cuba. The year 1917 opened with every promise of a very large crop in Cuba, and the price of sugar in the United States declined as the new crop began to flow in. In February there were strikes in some of the refineries, which caused a flurry in the sugar market, and prices advanced. At that period the American Sugar Refining Co. made a vigorous effort to assure their customers and the trade generally that there was no real shortage of sugar. Then came the troubles in Cuba, which led to another advance in price. Gomez, who was the leader of the revolution, surrendered on March 8 and the disturbances were practically over, but it was not known how much cane burning there had been and the experts reduced their estimates of the coming crop from 3,466,000 tons to 3,000,000 tons. On May 7 Mr. Hoover went before the Committee on Agriculture and predicted a scarcity of sugar, and this was the position which was held by the Food Administration. The result was that prices of sugar, speaking broadly, after some fluctuations stiffened, as prices always do when people begin to be afraid that there is going to be a scarcity in any article. The wholesale price of granulated rose in July to 7.50 in New York. Then it went to 7.65 on the 19th of July, on July 26 to 7.75, and then during the week from July 26 to August 2 it jumped to 8.15. Then it went as high as 8.40, and even touched 9.15. This means to the consumer, at 8.40, a price of from 9 to 9½ cents a pound, and at 9.15 from 10 to 10¼ cents a pound. On the 16th of August Mr. Hoover closed the exchange and, of course, dealings in sugar came to a standstill. On the 27th of August an agreement was announced with the beet-sugar manufacturers fixing the price of beet sugar at 7.25 at seaboard points, such as New York, Philadelphia, New Orleans, Boston, and San Francisco, with a differential for freight to interior points.

On October 1 the sugar refiners agreed with the Food Administration that they would buy all their sugar through the International Sugar Committee, which consisted of two Englishmen and three Americans—Mr. Rolph, the manager of the California & Hawaiian Sugar Refining Co.; Mr. Babst, the president of the American Sugar Refining Co.; and Mr. Jamison, representing the Arbuckle Co. The refiners also agreed that they would sell all sugar refined by them at a price not more than 1.3 cents a pound advance over the price of Cuban sugar. At the same time the International Committee fixed the price for Cuban raws—and the price for Cuban raws establishes the price for Porto Rican and Hawaiian sugars—at 6.90, and under their agreement the refiners were not permitted to buy sugars at 6.90 or higher and closed down. Later they were permitted to buy at 6.90, but it was then too late to have much effect on the supply of granulated, because there had been a period of idleness in the refineries. On October 23 the Food Administration came to an agreement with representatives of the Louisiana planters for a basic price of 6.35 at New Orleans, which meant 6.70 at Boston, which made the price of refined sugar 8.15, so that the Cuban sugars and the Louisiana sugars were brought into practical harmony as to price. The International Committee, whose membership I have already given, was formed on September 21. On October 1 they made the agreement with the American refiners by which they fixed a price of 6.90 for Cuban raws in New York, duty paid. They then entered into negotiations with the Cuban Government to fix the price of raw sugar for the coming crop of 1917–18. On November 30, 1917, the International Committee and the representatives of Cuba agreed on a price for Cuban raws of 4.60 f. o. b. Cuba. Personally I think the committee made a very good arrangement in the interest of the consumers abroad and in the United States, but I should have been quite as well satisfied if they had given the Cubans 4.75 f. o. b. instead of 4.60, because it seems to me of the last importance to encourage the production of sugar in Cuba. Sixty per cent of the Cuban sugars are produced by the colonos, small planters making a living of a few hundred dollars a year from their crop. If they can not do well with sugar they can turn easily to other crops. It would be much better for the American consumer to pay one-fourth or even one-half cent a pound more for sugar than to have the Cuban crop fall off. Therefore, I should have been content to have seen 4.75 fixed on as the price instead of 4.60. I asked Mr. Hoover whether they had considered the colonos, and he said they had done so. They certainly did not consider the beet grower when they made the arrangement fixing the price of beet sugar. The price was determined after consultation with the manufacturers alone, and no steps were taken effectively to consider the claims of the beet growers until after the Senate committee began its investigation. Yet the production of sugar can not be increased unless the beet growers of the United States and the colonos of Cuba are encouraged and given good prices. The beet planting begins so early in the year that if the dissatisfaction of the beet growers is not allayed we shall be in danger of a serious reduction in the crop of beet sugar, which might easily absorb the estimated and greatly needed increase in the Cuban crop.

The fact is that this necessity of encouraging the growth of cane and of beets, which are the raw material of sugar, is only a part of a general policy where I venture to think a very mistaken course has been pursued. The objects of all the legislation and of the action in regard to food and fuel were to reduce the cost of living and stimulate production. The two purposes are stated in the wrong order. The first thing to do is to stimulate production. I think I shall show very conclusively before I finish that attempts to lower prices by executive decree or by law can not with the present economic forces at work possibly succeed. On the other hand a great deal can be done to stimulate production. If production is stimulated, then the natural laws, which are much more powerful than Congresses and Presidents, begin to work. A large production will certainly steady prices and prevent famines. If carried to the point of oversupply it will lower prices, and it is the only thing in the long run that will. Therefore we should have addressed ourselves to the stimulation of production, and if anything could be done to lower prices it could be done in that way. Unfortunately the reduction of the cost of living has a most enticing sound. Success in such an undertaking is obviously popular, and popularity has meanings and results which I need not explain, certainly not to a body like the Senate. Therefore, in the search for popularity the difficult, if not the impossible, was undertaken, and the simple and direct method of aiding the war situation and of at least stabilizing prices was set aside or pushed into the background.

It will be seen from this outline that the Food Administration fixed the prices on practically all sugars in the market and showed an apparent reduction on the wholesale price of granulated from its highest point in August of about a cent, which may have meant a reduction to the consumer of a cent to a cent and a half. But after all these arrangements were made there ensued in the Eastern States a scarcity of sugar at times amounting to a famine. It is the belief of the Food Administration that by their action they prevented sugars going to very high prices, which, of course, would come out of the consumers of the United States. It is at this point that the doubt arises as to whether any advantage was gained by this price fixing. Speaking broadly the sugar market in normal times rises in the autumn to its highest point. The explanation of this is very simple. The rise represents the gap between the exhaustion of the old crop of cane sugars, which by the autumn has been practically consumed, and the new crop which begins to come in December and in large quantities after the opening of the new year, when, as a rule, the price of sugar declines. This gap between the old and new crops of cane sugar has been largely filled of late years—certainly prices have been much affected—by the coming on the market at that period of the beet sugar. In this past year most of the beet-sugar crops were late, and that extended the gap. Therefore it was certain that if there never had been any interference at all with the price of sugar there would none the less have been an advance in the price to the consumer in the autumn months of 1917, which would have been met and checked by the coming of the beet sugars and of the new cane crop. The position of the Food Administration is that there was a shortage of sugar, but these figures are disputed. Setting aside all the estimates and predictions which were made, and coming down to the actual facts, now that the year has closed, the crops of the United States field, with which alone we are dealing, were for the year 1916–17 as follows:

	Long tons.
Louisiana	271,339
Texas	6,250
Porto Rico	448,567
Hawaiian Islands	579,302
Virgin Islands	7,787
United States beet sugars	734,577
Cuba	3,023,720
Total	5,071,542

To this must be added the foreign imports of sugar, amounting to 204,665 tons, which came into the United States from countries other than Cuba and our outside possessions, and which are shown in the following table of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce:

Imports of cane sugar into the United States during the year ending Dec. 31, 1917.

Country from which imported:	Long tons.
Central America	14,393
Mexico	8,602
British West Indies	2,883
Dominican Republic	41,098
Dutch West Indies	96
Haiti	1,715
Peru	23,431
Other South America	20,371
China	259
Hongkong	116
Japan	13,181
Philippine Islands	78,415
All other countries	105
Total	204,665

The annual normal consumption in the United States, according to Mr. Hoover's estimate, which I believe to be a fair one, for the figures differ and there is some confusion in the statistics, is 3,700,000 tons. Deducting this from the total supply, we have 1,576,207 tons of what may be called sugar for export.

The total exports from the United States to every country in the world was 451,221 long tons, as will be seen from the following table of the Department of Commerce:

Exports of refined sugar from the United States to all countries during the year ending Dec. 31, 1917.

Countries:	Pounds.
Belgium	8,452,880
Denmark	3,091,356
France	372,812,708
Greece	1,130,295
Iceland	5,723,233
Italy	28,075,412
Malta, Gozo, etc	600,000
Gibraltar	560,000
Netherlands	19,506,219
Norway	76,408,182
Portugal	19,869
Russia in Europe	11,020,701
Spain	57,282,491
Sweden	21,485,566
Switzerland	21,503,960
England	118,993,257
Canada	708,253
Panama	4,431,199
Mexico	42,032,165
Newfoundland	7,037,575
West Indies	4,054,138
Argentina	143,628,561
Uruguay	46,711,472
Philippine Islands	254,939
British Africa	4,131,170
All other countries	11,080,400
Total	1,010,736,101

Or 451,221 long tons.

Deducting this amount and the 107,920 tons consumed in Cuba, as well as the 10,000 tons destroyed by fire, leaves 1,007,066 tons of free raw sugar for export. The exports of raws from Cuba to all countries other than the United States were 940,708 tons, thus leaving a surplus of 66,358 tons, if our consumption is normal. This, however, takes no account of the sugars on hand from previous years, what is known as the invisible supply, and it is only guesswork as to what that supply amounted to, but that there was a certain amount of sugar on hand is undoubted and that, of course, would increase the surplus. This, again, takes no account of the savings due to the work of Mr. Hoover's administration, which he was inclined to think about equaled the extra amount used in the canning recommended by the Food Administration. This computation, based not on estimates but upon actual facts of imports, production, and exports, certainly does not seem to justify the drastic measures which were taken in price fixing and which tended to cause a famine in certain parts of the country while there was an abundant amount of sugar in other portions of the United States, for it shows a surplus and not a shortage.

Mr. Hoover in making up his figures and in his testimony before the committee said that it was necessary for us to provide for the consumption of Canada 320,000 tons, which, of course, would show a shortage not only on his figures but on those which I have given and which I believe to be correct, as they are taken from the official statistics of the past year. If those figures are examined—and they show all our exports—it will be seen that we exported to Canada 708,253 pounds, or 316 tons of sugar.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator means 316,000 tons, does he not?

Mr. LODGE. No; 316 tons of sugar. The figures from the Department of Commerce are 708,253 pounds, which I reduced to 316 long tons.

There was also exported to Canada 6,054 tons of sugar which had been imported to the United States and then exported to that country. Adding to this Canada's own production of 12,500 tons of beet sugar and the 3,515 tons of Cuban raws which she took in violation of the international committee price, makes a total of 22,385 tons which she actually received during the year 1917 from her own production and the United States field. It is obvious, therefore, that the balance of the 320,000 tons must have been procured by Canada from some other source, and the examination of the following table will at once disclose where she obtained it:

Production of sugar accessible to Canada during 1917 in the American hemisphere outside the field of the United States.

	Tons.
Trinidad	70,000
Barbados	50,000
Jamaica	28,331
British West Indies	30,000
San Domingo	130,000
Demerara	101,650
Venezuela	15,000
Ecuador	8,000
Peru	250,000
Brazil	300,000
Total	982,981

Many of these figures that I have read are not the crop, but the actual export. We could not in some cases get the figures of the whole crop. This shows, of course, that Canada was not supplied from the United States last year. She got her sugar somewhere else, and she will get it somewhere else again. It is just as easy for the English ships and the Canadian ships to go to the West Indies and to South America as it is for our ships. As a matter of fact, Canada bought a large amount of sugar under contract from Peru.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What was that amount?

Mr. LODGE. That she had available? Nine hundred and eighty-two thousand tons accessible, and she needed 300,000 tons, in round numbers. I have, of course, not been able to examine the export tables for those countries; but I merely show the field from which she got it, and she got it somewhere, because she did not get it from us.

Let us, in this connection, first consider the amount of sugar available and visible in the United States field in September, October, and November, apart from the small remaining remnant of the Cuban crop which amounted to about 50,000 tons and which ultimately came chiefly into the markets of the United States. That is the amount available in the autumn months, when the famine came. It appears from the testimony (page 402) that including what was on hand September 1 and what was subsequently received the Western Sugar Refining Co. of California had altogether 60,285 tons during that period and the California & Hawaiian Sugar Refining Co. had 67,498 tons. These were Hawaiian sugars and were all sold in the western country. During those three months the Louisiana crop of 271,339 tons came on the market, as is shown by the agreement made with the Louisiana planters as to prices on October 23. Within that same period the beet-sugar crop began to come on the market and the total of that crop, according to the official figures, was 734,577 long tons. In other words, in the United States alone there was available either in or coming into the market 1,139,699 tons of sugar. To this must be added the 50,000 tons still remaining in Cuba, at least 40,000 tons of which finally came on the market and some Peruvian sugars which the committee was told might have been obtained but were not. Taking the normal consumption of 310,000 tons a month in round numbers, based on Mr. Hoover's estimate of 3,700,000 tons for annual consumption, there would have been required about 930,000 tons, or 200,000 tons less than the total amount of sugar in the country, for those three months during which the scarcity was at its worst in the East, and I am unable to see any good reason on these figures for a scarcity of sugar at that time anywhere in the United States. What then was the cause of the scarcity east of the Alleghenies? In the first place the Hawaiian sugars of the two great California refineries were all sold in the West, chiefly west of the Missouri River. Of the Louisiana crop 26,000 tons were secured by the American Sugar Refining Co. for the eastern market and the rest of that crop was refined in Louisiana and in the form of plantation granulated or pure refined sugar went chiefly into the western country. Some went to the East, but it is impossible to say how much, and there was such difficulty in getting figures at all that it was obviously a comparatively small amount. The beet-sugar production was also held in the West, and this holding of sugar west of the Alleghanies was done deliberately. On October 20 it was announced from Chicago (hearings, page 1011) that the Food Administration sugar-distributing committee authorized a public announcement that the beet sugar would come to the rescue of New England and the North Atlantic States east of Buffalo and Pittsburgh and north of and including Baltimore during the existing exhaustion of cane supplies. It was further said that shipments would come immediately. This dispatch addressed to sugar dealers in the East was signed by the Meinrath Brokerage Co. On October 22 the same company announced to their eastern correspondents that there were no beet-sugar assignments obtainable for any territory, and on the 23d of October they telegraphed to representatives in central and eastern territories that they had been informed by the Food Administration sugar-distributing committee that "they would not allot for distribution any orders received by us on or after this date." On October 25 they telegraphed that orders already submitted were being held up by the Food Administration. This stopped the movement of beet sugars east and it was not until the 22d of November that the eastern trade were notified that the distribution of sugars would be entirely in the hands of the American refiners' committee in New York. These sugars which I have described were all held west of the Alleghenies, and although eastern dealers were told they would have relief they did not get it. Various excuses were given; that there was a delay in the beet-sugar crop coming forward, which was no doubt true owing to the lateness of the season, and that there was a shortage of cars. There was a shortage of cars undoubtedly, but cars could have been procured if the proper effort had been made, as was later abundantly demonstrated. On December 14 the price of beet sugar at Boston was advanced from 7.25 to 8.15, the price of cane sugar at the same point, and the beet sugars began to move. They ceased to lurk behind the Alleghenies and came out into the region of scarcity. In other words, beet sugars followed the natural law of supply and demand. When they got a sufficiently good price they moved in that direction, as all commodities are certain to do when unhampered by artificial restrictions.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. REED. Perhaps the Senator intended to refer to it further on in his address, but he apparently is leaving the immediate topic. The Senator will recall that Mr. Hoover in his testimony finally admitted that it had been his express policy to keep the sugar west of the Alleghenies. The Senator has been proceeding along the line of deduction from the evidence, but the direct statement is in the evidence by Mr. Hoover himself.

Mr. LODGE. I am much obliged to the Senator for calling my attention to that. It ought to be stated here. I used the general phrase "deliberately done."

Another reason for the shortage was the arbitrary closing of the refineries and the refusal to permit them to buy any sugars they could pick up, like the Peruvian, even if they agreed not to advance the price of refined sugar to the consumer. In my opinion the shortage of sugar was artificial and caused by the attempt to establish artificial prices and by interfering to some extent with distribution. There is no sufficient evidence that there was not a sufficient supply of sugar to furnish our allies, as we did, with what they wanted, and at the same time to furnish ourselves with enough for normal consumption.

It ought, in justice to the Food Administration, to be said that they made strenuous efforts to get the 900,000 tons of Java sugar to this country, which would have completely removed any possible danger of a shortage. They tried first to have the German ships used which were lying at Manila and with which they could have brought the crop if they had been allowed to control them and a considerable portion of the crop if they had been permitted to make only one voyage. This was prevented by the action of the Shipping Board and here we cross the trail of the endless organizations which we have created to meet war emergencies. They felt it more important that the German ships should come here loaded with hemp. I am not questioning the wisdom of their action, for I do not know the facts. The Food Administration also made an effort to get permission for some Dutch ships to bring the Java sugar, and here international complications apparently stepped in and prevented relief from that quarter. It may be said in passing that the new crop which is now coming forward is not coming in proper amounts, unless there has been a very recent change, and this slowness of movement from Cuba and Porto Rico is due again to lack of tonnage. No one appreciates more than I do the need of tonnage for carrying men and supplies of all sorts across the Atlantic, but I think the necessity of supplying this country and also our allies with sugar refined here puts the movement of the cane crops of Cuba and Porto Rico on the same basis of importance as that which we must recognize on the Atlantic. I ought, in justice to Mr. Hoover, to say that I believe he made every effort to secure rail distribution in this country just as he endeavored to get tonnage for the Java sugars. How much he was thwarted by the railroad situation and the tangle of priority orders I do not know, but it is certain that if he had been efficiently aided instead of being crossed by the other commissions, there could have been no sugar famine in the Eastern States.

The fact remains, however, that on the face of the official figures we had enough sugar to go through the last three months of the year without a famine. Owing to the gap between the old crop of cane and the new crop of cane and to the delay in beet sugars, there is no doubt that prices would have reached a high point in the autumn and then would have declined, as they did decline when the new crop appeared in the market. We should have had high prices for sugar—there is no reason to suppose that they would have been unreasonably high if there had been a proper distribution of the available sugar in the United States—but admitting that there would have been high prices at the period I have described, there can be no doubt that with the higher prices there would have been sufficient sugar in all parts of the country for the normal consumption of the people of the United States. The promise is for a larger crop next year in the United States field than during the year which has just passed. If the indications in Cuba prove to be correct, it will be a much larger amount, and it may also be possible to secure the Java sugar. I am heartily in favor of husbanding the supply, however large, by the most thorough saving in the consumption of sugar which can be effected, and if that is done to anything like the extent quite reasonably set by the Food Administration we shall have a very large surplus of sugar with which to aid our allies. But if shipping is withheld and price fixing is indulged in again and sugar is diverted or held in one part of the country, when it ought not to be held, owing to at empts of a commission in Chicago or Washington to change the channels of distribution, we shall have another scarcity when the scarcity period arrives next autumn probably of a worse character and wholly needless.

Thus we find the two central facts as a result of the policy adopted by the Food Administration in regard to sugar to have been a slight reduction in the price from the high point reached in August and a scarcity of sugar, amounting in some cases to a famine, in certain parts of the country, and especially those parts where the population is densest. It is quite true that the advocates of the policy insist that the action of the Food Administration saved the country from paying enormous prices for sugar. What those enormous prices were to be varied according to the taste and feeling of the prophet who set them forth, and are profoundly affected by his relations with the Food Administration. We were told that sugar might have been 15, 20, or 30 cents a pound had it not been for the Food Administration's beneficent interfereuce. One eminent refiner pointed with admiration to the decline in sugar at the present time, stating that it had gone to 7.10. The searcher for truth can not resist suggesting to this eminent refiner that the price of sugar has almost invariably declined at the beginning of the new year, with the advent of the new crop of cane. It seems harsh to throw the slightest shadow on such disinterested judgment as that manifested by the witness to whom I refer, and yet it is impossible to escape the conclusion that the natural law which insures a decline of sugar prices on the coming of a new crop, even although the importations, despite a larger crop, have thus far been less this year than usual, brought about the result which is so loyally attributed to the Food Administration. Another enthusiastic refiner, with proper gratitude no doubt for the beneficial effects of the stabilization of prices, wrote me that sugar would have gone to 50 cents a pound if it had not been for the intervention of the Food Administration, which he seemed to regard as a deus ex machina. As I read this warm-hearted prediction I wondered at the writer's moderation. When you are depicting the horrors of a price which never existed, why not paint it in really strong colors? Why stop at 50 cents? Why not say it would have cost a dollar a pound, or even more, if it had not been for the fortunate intervention of authority in Washington? The fact is you can do anything with prices which never existed. That is their great advantage. You can put them up or put them down at pleasure, to suit your hopes, your argument, or your prejudices. But human nature is so weak that the vast majority of people who in a large section of the country were deprived of sugar said, in their unthinking way, that they would rather have paid a higher price and had some sugar. The gratitude which they ought to have felt for the low prices established by the Food Administration did not seem to comfort them when they sat at a table where sugar had become a memory, and where that agreeable condiment had ceased to have an actual existence. They did not enjoy as they ought to have enjoyed this Barmecide feast. On the contrary, their emotions seemed to have resembled those of Tantalus, to whom the knowledge that fruit and water were close at hand gave no satisfaction, because the fruit and the water fled at the approach of his lips. An American humorist many years ago said in one of his newspaper paragraphs that there was probably nothing more unsatisfying than an "unkissed kiss"; but in mere sterility of pleasure I think low prices for sugar and no sugar runs the joke of the humorist very hard.

Let us now consider briefly the short and simple but somewhat painful annals of the coal question. The country had been threatened with a scarcity of coal in the winter of 1916 and 1917, and when war came in the spring the coal market was in a disturbed condition, and this disturbance was increased by the coming of war and the uncertainty as to the future. The market became very nervous; prices of coal began to advance sharply, reaching extreme points, and conditions indicated a still further rise. The advisory committee on coal at that time was headed by Mr. F. S. Peabody, of Chicago, and this committee was made up as follows:

Mr. F. S. Peabody, chairman; Mr. E. J. Berwind, president of the Berwind White Coal Mining Co., of New York; Mr. W. W. Keefer, president of the Pittsburgh Terminal Railroad & Coal Co., Pittsburgh; Mr. Van. H. Manning, Director of the United States Bureau of Mines; Mr. C. M. Moderwell, a coal operator of Illinois, president of the United Coal Mining Co., of Chicago; Mr. E. L. Pierce, vice president of the Semet Solvay Co., of Syracuse, large by-product and coke-product operators; Mr. Erskine Ramsey, vice president of the Pratt Consolidated Coal Co., Birmingham, Ala.; Mr. George Otis Smith, Director of the United States Geological Survey; Mr. James J. Storrow, of Lee Higginson & Co., of Boston; Mr. H. N. Taylor, vice president of the Central Coal & Coke Co., of Kansas City, Mo.; Mr. S. D. Warriner, president of the Lehigh Valley Coal & Navigation Co., Philadelphia; Mr. J. F. Wellborn, president of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., of Denver; Mr. Daniel B. Wentz, president of the Stonega Coal & Coke Co., Philadelphia; Mr. George W. Elliott, who was the secretary and the representative of the gas and electric service corporations of the United States; Mr. John P. White, who was then president of the United Mine Workers of America; Mr. Frank Hayes, vice president of the United Mine Workers of America; Mr. William Green, secretary of the United Mine Workers of America; Mr. John L. Lewis, the statistician of the United Mine Workers of America; Mr. James Lord, who is with Mr. Samuel Gompers, and is president of the mining department of the American Federation of Labor; Mr. John Mitchell, who is an ex-labor leader; Mr. H. L. Kerwin, secretary to the Secretary of Labor, Mr. Wilson; Mr. Herbert Addison, vice president of the Big Horn Collieries, Wyoming; Mr. L. S. Storrs, president of the Connecticut Co., of New Haven, Conn.; Mr. George W. Reed is Mr. Peabody's secretary and vice president of his company.

I think anyone who has examined the subject with as much care as the subcommittee which held the hearing will agree that this was a very well chosen committee. It is the only one that I happen to know of where not only operators were represented but also the labor employed in the mines, and, which was most remarkable, the consumers. There were two gentlemen representing public utilities and one, Mr. Storrow, of Boston, who spoke for the consumers of New England, both domestic and industrial.

The prices proclaimed on August 23, 1917, for anthracite coal were practically those agreed to by the operators themselves in April of that year, and ranged on the white ash, red ash, and Lykens Valley grades from $4.45 to $5.30 per ton at the pit mouth. Pea coal, priced by error in the proclamation at $4.30, was later reduced to $3.40. With trifling exceptions all the anthracite comes from the Pennsylvania field, which is not of large extent, and Dr. Garfield testified that there was only one case of complaint of prices relating to anthracite. With prices established in this way by the voluntary agreement of operators anthracite was not affected by the Government price fixing, and in what I am about to say it will be understood that I am discussing bituminous coal alone.

Under the auspices of Mr. Peabody's committee, the coal operators controlling nearly all the bituminous coal production of the country—over 90 per cent—were invited to Washington in June. Some 350 to 400 were present. They were addressed by Secretary Lane, by Gov. Fort, of the Trade Commission, and Mr. Peabody. They were urged to come to an agreement as to a maximum price for run of mine bituminous coal. After a day or two of discussion they adopted a resolution prepared by Gov. Fort by which they agreed substantially that the price of run of mine coal should in no case exceed $3 a ton in the East and $2.75 in the West at the pit mouth. The arrangement was understood to be tentative, but it made a very large reduction, because bituminous coals were then selling as high as $5.50, and even up to $6 a ton. There was no attempt to fix a minimum price or an absolute price, and below $3 or $2.75 coal operators could make any price they pleased, which gave sufficient elasticity, as some of the mines could produce coal at a much lower rate than $3 or $2.75 and make a good return. This agreement was reached on the 28th of June. Two days later Secretary Baker, head of the Council of National Defense, made public announcement that this maximum price of $3 was oppressive and extortionate, and the whole scheme which had been so carefully prepared, and which was a wise scheme, because it interfered as little as possible with the ordinary laws of trade and yet cut off undue profits, was practically disavowed. Some of those who had come into the agreement regarded the whole matter as at an end and charged such prices as they could get, but most of the operators who had agreed to it held to their agreement. The action of Mr. Secretary Baker of course had the effect of throwing the general market for free bituminous coal into complete confusion and of forcing a reduction in production. At the same time the promise was held out that the price of coal would be still further reduced and large numbers of people, domestic as well as industrial consumers, instead of laying in coal in the summer when the demand was at its lowest and the railroads could carry more easily than at any other season, refrained from filling their bins, with the inevitable result that they became buyers at a later time and were competing for the purchase of coal in the winter when the stress was most severe.

Dr. Garfield was appointed Fuel Administrator on the 23d of August and immediately issued a table of prices which had been approved by the President and compiled by the Trade Commission and which fixed the basic price of run of mine bituminous coal at $2 a ton at the pit mouth. The great difficulty of the coal situation then as now was in the shortage of cars as well as the shortage of movement on the railroads. Strong and effective efforts, with large beneficial results, were being made by the war railroad committee to improve the traffic situation, but in addition to the other difficulties were the priority orders. If those orders had been left in the hands of the priority board and no one else had been permitted to issue them, the business could have been managed probably with advantage, certainly without any injury to the coal situation. But the right to issue priority orders, unfortunately, was not confined to the priority board. So far as your committee could learn, officers of the Army and Navy, Food and Fuel Administrations, directly or indirectly, and the Shipping Board had the right to issue priority orders and to put the "blue tag," as it was called, on the articles which they wished shipped. Some of these agents also gave these envelopes and tags to manufacturers engaged on Government work, who did not always confine their use to public business. The result of this delightful and intelligent scattering of great powers was that the railroads were blocked with priority shipments of all kinds, sometimes for articles of immediate necessity and also for many where the necessity was far from immediate. It was stated that over 80 per cent of the freights being carried by the railroads were on priority orders, and this complicated enormously the bad conditions of transportation and severely hampered the remarkable work of the railroad committee. Behind all this, and worst of all, was the fundamental trouble of the railroad situation, arising from the fact that when the war broke out they were at least ten years behind the requirements of normal and peaceful times. The railroads had been forced, as a rule, to reduce their rates to the lowest possible point, while at the same time the wages they paid and all their general expenses were increasing like all other prices and commodities. This produced great difficulty in getting new money, either by selling stocks or by borrowing, and the railroads, reduced practically to no resources except their surplus, which in some cases was very small, in all cases insufficient, had been wholly unable for some years past to make the necessary extensions which the business of the country required. The railroad situation was therefore very bad, owing to the manner in which freight rates had been dealt with over a considerable period of years; in addition, they were burdened with the sudden and greatly increased demands of the war, and were still further hopelessly embarrassed by the priority orders. The committee of railroad presidents, as I have said, were doing their best to relieve the situation and effected some extraordinary and very important but still inadequate improvements. Total relief was perhaps impossible, but a considerable, a much larger, measure of relief might have been obtained if the efforts of the Government had been addressed solely to the railroad problem; for, I repeat, the condition of the railroads, the shortage of cars and the shortage of movement were the fundamental and dominant difficulties affecting the coal supply. Upon this complicated and difficult situation the untried men known as the Fuel Administration were suddenly imposed. The Fuel Administration came in with no power whatever to deal with the railroad situation, which was the very center and heart of the problem. They could procure priority orders, divert coal shipments, and add to the tangle which those orders had created; and this they did, but they had no railroad control and could only make the movement of freight more labyrinthine than it already was. They had neither the authority nor the capacity even to loosen the knot, and thereupon into this situation, which might have had great relief by straight dealing with the railroad problem as a whole and by itself, the Fuel Administration entered and proceeded to fix a price which made it impossible to work many mines and which thereby frightened the producer and tended to reduce production when it was unprotected by contracts.

Not content with this, they also set to work to change the whole system of distribution. No more reckless experiment could have been attempted or one better calculated to make the railroad difficulties, so far as coal was concerned, insuperable. The distribution of coal from the mine to the consumer had been slowly built up by the experience of nearly seventy-five years into a great and intricate system, covering the whole country. The channels through which the coal flowed had been during this long time established. In a moment, by the action of the Fuel Administration, this vast network of distribution was suddenly thrown out of gear so that it either did not work at all or worked very badly and clumsily. At a single blow they crippled and partially paralyzed all the machinery of distribution and deprived themselves and the country of the great driving power of private interest never so valuable as in a period of disturbed transportation. I am not blaming the Fuel Administration for their failure to substitute a new and better system of distribution for the one which they overthrew. To have done that successfully in a few weeks was beyond the power of man. No one lives, or ever lived, who could have done it. I blame them for attempting it. Only ignorance of simple economic laws could be offered as an excuse, and I think this is a case where the old maxim, "Ignorantia legis neminem excusat" properly applies. In any event the results were deplorable. The attempted substitution of artificial channels for those made smooth by long practice, the diversion of coal from one part of the country to the other, instead of relieving the difficulty created by the railroad situation enormously enhanced it. It was found that the basic price of $2, even with variegated exemptions and exceptions, was too low, and the Fuel Administration itself was compelled in October to advance it to $2.45 a ton. Within a few days they have issued another order raising the price at the mine to $2.65, but cutting off, as I understand, the moderate 15 cents per ton commission of the wholesalers and jobbers. It would seem as if this would throw out of business thousands of honest, industrious men, great and small, who constitute the machinery of distribution. They will suffer loss and the country will suffer still more when the distribution machinery is thus wrecked and scattered.

Another thing which has led to a great interference with the coal distribution and the coal business in every direction are the orders which have been showered upon the country ever since the Fuel Administration came into existence. We have had contradictory orders, explanatory orders, new orders, and all supplemented by statements through the press. The whole producing force which furnishes coal to the country was kept in utter confusion, and there is nothing so numbing to business as suspense and uncertainty. The Fuel Administration has supplied uncertainty in unlimited quantities. I hold in my hand, as an example, Order No. 383, published on February 15. There have been several, I believe, since then. The number 383 means that orders in regard to coal have been falling upon the unhappy persons engaged in the work of producing and distributing coal and upon a guileless public at the rate of more than two a day. No. 383 fixes a new price for the Clearfield district of Pennsylvania of $2.60 run-of-mine and 5 mills additional per ton for a fund for all operators. This is a belated attempt to recognize the difference between thin veins and thick veins. Let me give one or two more as illustrations of special arrangements and exemptions in which the coal business has been wandering for the last six months. No. 371 is the one which lifted the heatless Mondays from North Carolina, Tennessee, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana, the warm part of the country, where coal was apparently but little needed for heating, and left it on densely populated parts of the country where they were very cold. The other two that I have are No. 366 and No. 367. One—No. 367—classifying bituminous coal mines in the upper Potomac, Cumberland, and the Piedmont fields, affecting all the coal in the State of Maryland and in the counties of Mineral, Grant, and Tucker, and the extreme eastern and southeastern portion of Preston County, W. Va., has made changes in the prices. No. 366 affected coal mines in Kenova and Thacker fields, the extreme southern part of Wayne County, the extreme northwestern part of McDowell County, W. Va., and the extreme northern part of Buchanan County, Va. This changed and rearranged prices of coal in those fields.

And now, by Order No. 383 of the 15th of February, in the Clearfield district of Pennsylvania, the price has been increased by 60 cents and it appears from publication "No. 4–B–5–1918" of the Fuel Administration that this price does not include the 45 cents per ton for wage increase allowed under the President's order of October 27, 1917. I understand that the words "does not include" mean that the 45 cents are not deducted; that the price fixed does not include the 45 cents which still remains on.

Mr. REED. Is that the 45 cents on account of the wage increase?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; and the price fixed did not include the 45 cents for increase of wages.

Mr. REED. That is perfectly clear. I have run that out pretty carefully. Forty-five cents on account of increase in wages applies to all bituminous mines in the United States. Correctly stated, there was an advance of 45 cents made on every ton of bituminous coal, the statement being made that it was made for and on account of an increase of wages.

Mr. LODGE. Precisely; that was in October.

Mr. REED. And that went on the price, and stayed on, and still applies.

Mr. LODGE. They have raised the price in the Clearfield district—I have a list of the mines here—to $2.60, and, as I understand, that does not include the 45 cents they allowed for the wage increase.

Mr. REED. That is correct.

Mr. LODGE. There is no doubt about it. This then is the situation: On August 21 the price was fixed at $2; on October 27, 45 cents per ton was added; on February 15, 60 cents more was added, making the present price $3.05 per ton, 5 cents more than the price made by an agreement of operators under the leadership of Secretary Lane and Mr. Peabody, which Secretary Baker characterized as unjust, exorbitant, and oppressive. Is it any wonder in view of these orders which have been flying over the country like the migratory birds in spring and autumn—is it any wonder that the coal of the country has failed to reach the furnaces and the fireplaces of the consumers?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. How much did the price the Senator just announced exceed the price fixed by Secretary Lane?

Mr. LODGE. It exceeded that price by 5 cents.

Let me pause here a moment to discuss briefly the attempt to fix prices for coal. A flat basic price is an impossibility. The great coal fields of the country differ widely in costs of production owing to natural causes. Mines in the same field differ. A price which would be ruinous to one mine would give an exorbitant profit to another. To fix the same price for the mines of Illinois, with their wide veins ranging from 8 to 20 feet, as for the mines of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and West Virginia, some of which have veins only 18 inches to 3 feet wide, is absurd on its face. And yet these thin veins in certain districts of West Virginia, Pennsylvania, and elsewhere in the East contain in many instances the very finest coal. The low volatile coals, which are used on battleships and give very little smoke, and the high volatile coals, with which the coking is done and from which we get many of our most important explosives, are found very largely in narrow veins. A price which would be very high for the broad veins of Illinois would be destructive to such veins as I have just described. Moreover, it was difficult to see that any proper distinctions had been made as to quality in the coals, and any plan of price fixing which is not based on quality and cost of production must be unsound and unjust.

There was another very bad result from this attempt to fix a low basic flat price without regard to or with a very insufficient allowance for differences in quality. As the producer could get in bituminous coal the same price substantially for low-grade as for high-grade coal, inferior coals filled with impurities or taken from culm banks and low in thermal units were sent out in large quantities, probably sufficient to account for the increase in the total production of bituminous coal. In this way cars and locomotives were wasted in carrying tons of slate, ash, and other impurities to the consumer, and thereby the shortage of cars was increased and the railroad movement still further diminished. The outcome of all this confusion was, of course, that some mines were making a great deal of money; that others were making none, but were just managing to live; while still others were only kept in business by their contracts made before the advent of the Fuel Administration. It became perfectly evident to the committee that it was necessary either to adopt the system employed by Mr. Hoover in regard to the beet-sugar factories and make a price which would allow the weakest and least profitable properties to live and produce, and which, of course, made the profits of the large factories and mines, and particularly of the factories and mines of the highest efficiency, enormous and disproportionate, or else to fix a price for each separate factory or mine—an undertaking which, as in the case of coal, where you are dealing with 20,000 mines, is of such extreme difficulty that it would cause delays wholly intolerable in time of war. The system adopted by Mr. Hoover had at least the merit of maintaining production. The system of making a different price for each mine based on its costs was impracticable. Hardly less impracticable would be the scheme of having the Government buy all the coal produced and sell it at an average price which would guard the Government against loss. This scheme, of course, would have involved an enormous expenditure of money in the first instance and would have caused great delays. The plan of having the Government, with its really notable business incompetence, work all the mines would simply have meant that hardly any coal would have been obtained. We therefore come back either to the scheme adopted by Mr. Hoover in regard to beet-sugar factories or to allowing the natural laws of supply and demand to work, so far as possible, without artificial interference. The latter solution undoubtedly might have led to higher prices than we have actually been obliged to pay for coal, although it seems improbable that this would have happened. But even if this had happened, it would have brought coal; for a commodity, whatever it may be, which is of wide distribution will follow the direction to which it is invited by profitable prices as surely as water will flow down hill. The result of the Fuel Administration's policy was to add to the already enormous railroad difficulties by creating chaos in distribution and adding to all this, suspense, alarm, and uncertainty due to fixing an arbitrary price. Even if we admit that they kept prices down, which is purely guesswork, they brought a coal famine with this nominal fixed price.

The total production of bituminous coal for the year 1917 as given by the Geological Survey was nearly 41,000,000 tons more than for the previous year and of anthracite nearly 11,000,000 tons. Undoubtedly the consumption, owing to the abnormal activity of certain industries, was much increased in the country, and the additional 52,000,000 tons was probably not sufficient to meet the demands. If the increase in production was sufficient not only to meet the larger consumption but also to make up for the decrease in thermal units due to placing upon the market inferior grades of coal, then it would follow that the shortage of coal and the consequent loss and suffering were wholly due to the defective distribution caused by the Fuel Administration, for very little, if any, coal is ever stored at the mine. It is safer, however, to assume that the increase in production largely composed of inferior coals was wholly inadequate fully to meet the increased demands. But in either case, if the mines could have worked, not to their possible capacity, but to the full capacity of the labor they actually had, it is perfectly evident from the testimony before the committee that this increase in the production of 1917 could easily have been doubled in coals of high quality. The mines could not work to capacity—and I am speaking always of the capacity with the labor that they actually had—because they could not get cars. And so we come back again to the railroad difficulty, which certainly might have been greatly relieved if the Government had established no Fuel Administration but had simply devoted itself last summer to relaxing the railroad congestion and reducing priority orders to the lowest terms. The most important thing, of course, was to get coal to the ships. The Government had power to take coal; the Government had power under existing law to compel the railroads to carry any freight that was ordered. The amount of coal needed for the ships and for transport could be readily estimated, for the departments knew the possible tonnage and knew, of course, of the departure and arrival of vessels. And yet when we got into the dead of winter it was shown in the testimony before the committee that there were from 100 to 150 ships tied up in New York Harbor because the bunker coal could not be delivered. Then came the brilliant solution of shutting down factories in Maine and sawmills in Mississippi in order to relieve congestion at the port of New York. It may have been that nothing could have been done with the situation, that the railroad problem was beyond solution. Personally I do not believe that to have been the case. I think the railroad difficulties could have been much relieved, especially if the work of the war railroad board in the summer had not been hampered. But nothing can be more certain than that the policy of the Fuel Administration, its attempt to substitute a new scheme of distribution for the one which had been the slow creation of nearly seventy-five years, and its reckless price fixing brought on a coal famine in a country which has more coal than any other country in the world, and led to the "heatless-days" order, which in itself was a complete confession of impotence and failure. It may be said, "It is easy to criticize and find fault. What would you have substituted?" That question, in my opinion, can be as easily answered as asked. If instead of undertaking to fix an abnormally low price for coal in order to say to the country that by an order, by a ukase, we were going to reduce the cost of living, a vain and empty promise, we had addressed ourselves to the railroad problem, and nothing else, the coal shortage would have been very much reduced and the loss and suffering very much less. If in addition we had let alone the system of distribution, so long established, we should have been saved from the chaos and confusion into which we were thrown by the Fuel Administration. If, grasping the railroad situation in the summer, the Government had seen first that the supply of coal for shipping, which is useless without coal, had been secured, and then, instead of denouncing hoarding, as they call it, had advised everyone to buy and store coal in the summer months the stress and suffering and loss which have come upon us in a hard winter and which are still far from being relieved would have been in large measure avoided.

The lesson which all this teaches is that we should address ourselves to doing what is reasonably possible. It was reasonably possible to mitigate the railroad situation to a very considerable degree. It was not possible to force an artificial [illegible]uction of prices. You might declare a price, but if it was effective you would pay for it in some other way. You can no more stop the advance of prices under war conditions, with many millions of men withdrawn from reproductive industry, to be made either consumers or the makers of unproductive commodities, than you can divert the course of Niagara by putting your finger in at the edge of the water. I do not blame men charged with responsibility for failing to accomplish the impossible. I do blame them for making promises which never could be fulfilled and in searching for something popular, to give to the people a nominally low price accompanied by a total inability to buy the commodity. In the weeks we have just been passing through the people of the United States would much rather have paid more for coal even than they did and have had the coal. They have paid high prices—the highest ever known—but have been unable to get coal. There is not much warmth in being told that a thoughtful Government has lowered the cost of coal when you have no coal to keep the fires burning.

Now, as an illustration of the practical effects of the reckless order closing down factories and industries of all sorts for five days I give two concrete examples of factories in my own State, both large, well-established, and well-run organizations. The first is as follows:

We believe that you may be interested in knowing the results of the order of the Fuel Administrator with reference to the consumption of coal at our plant during the period of shutdown. By way of comparison we state the amount of coal consumed by us during the same days in the week previous. The consumption was as follows:

	Pounds.
Friday, Jan. 11	102,310
Saturday, Jan. 12	73,500
Sunday, Jan. 13	71,230
Monday, Jan. 14	104,625
Tuesday, Jan. 15	105,600
		457,265
Friday, Jan. 18	73,335
Saturday, Jan. 19	45,635
Sunday, Jan. 20	55,735
Monday, Jan. 21	55,205
Tuesday, Jan. 22	70,140
		300,050
		157,215

This means that by maintaining our power plant merely for the purpose of keeping our pipes from freezing and for a very small amount of necessary power we were able to save about 15 tons a day. The loss in wages to our employees was about $7,000 a day and our loss in production and profit was obviously considerably in excess. The situation in our case was undoubtedly the same as many other manufacturers. We have sufficient coal on hand to keep our employees busy and to give them full compensation for their services. An order by the Railroad Director withdrawing transportation facilities would have meant the operation of our plant without financial loss. A system could have been devised by which the material which had accumulated for transportation could have been gradually released.

The second relates to an industry which is largely engaged in Government work, and I think the following figures are worth consideration:

The loss of production for the four working days, January 18, 19, 21, and 22, was (net)	$340,000
The loss of wages to our employees was	80,000
The loss to our stockholders by reason of overhead expenses was	50,000
Against which we made a saving of fuel of 146 tons, or practically	1,500

It would seem that the sacrifice was not commensurate with the saving obtained, and that the delay upon necessary and desired materials for war work will be seriously noticed in the immediate future.

These two examples represent thousands of other industries throughout the country and I introduce them to show what a loss and shock to our whole industrial fabric were caused by this ill-considered and violent action of the Fuel Administration.

In this connection I quote an editorial from the New York Times bearing on the results of this order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, permission is granted.

The editorial referred to is as follows:

PROFIT AND LOSS OF COAL SAVING.

Figures compiled for the Director General of Railways indicate that the five-day coal saving campaign in New York City saved $31,500,395 worth of coal, at the cost of $357,498,000 in wages and over a billion loss of production. For 18 leading cities the economy of coal totaled $137,000,000, and the loss of wages $1,221,415,000. The manufactures' loss exceeded three billions. Each dollar's worth of coal cost labor $9 in wages and employers $23 in production. There are no authoritative figures for the entire country, nor is the cost of coalless Mondays known with any precision.

Although the report is by an expert, it is not above criticism. Only in form is it a debit and credit statement, and there are omissions which lessen its worth. The 18 cities for which profit and loss are estimated are all eastern cities necessarily, for the suspension was in the East. The loss in the East had compensation in the West, both directly and indirectly, in the gain to the West of the betterment of transportation. The greatest and fatal omission is that of the worth of breaking the ocean blockade. What was it worth to get hundreds of cargoes of supplies across the seas? What was it worth to have the movement of coal made nearly normal? What was it worth to relieve the railroad congestion, the real motive of the coal order? It is easy to say that the same benefits could have been had more cheaply, but that is discussion of something else than the profit or loss of this plan.

It is true that not even Germany resorted to general industrial arrest as a means of railway relief, but it is also true that no other country than ours undertook to serve the world or experienced such weather troubles. The defects of the Garfield plan are too plain to be denied, and the wisdom of the hindsight criticism is easy. But there was no suggestion of any alternative when it was adopted, and Canada adopted it after our own experience of its objectionable features. Now is the time for the critics of the Fuel Director's plans to say what they would do with the problem of the future.

There is no reason to suppose that the coal problem will end with winter unless spring should bring peace. The coal problem is with us for the war at least, and many think for long after. There is some danger that Mr. Garfield may embark upon an adventure of greater scope than the restriction plan, whatever its merits or demerits. The coal trade was against him originally; it came to his support after an explanation by him of his plans, and it turned against him when it thought it detected signs that he was committed to propaganda rather than to winning the war. Is the Fuel Director embarking upon plans for Government distribution of a necessary of life, thus supplanting the trade of coal production and distribution? The coal trade may be dodging before it is hit. And the profit-and-loss statement of such a plan may be as defective as the one which has suffered such criticism. But propaganda and winning the war ought to be compartmented, and their profits and losses separately considered.

Moreover, the real difficulty when this order was issued and which existed six months ago was with the railroads. Between last summer and the present moment a Director General with the largest powers has been appointed to take charge of the railroads of the country, and yet here is the condition on the 1st of this month, as stated on the 6th of February in Commerce and Finance, an important financial and industrial journal published in New York City:

Reports from 70 per cent of the bituminous mines show that in two days last week, Friday and Saturday, the car shortage caused a loss in production of more than 582,000 tons and that 42,546 miners were forced to be idle. With munition and industrial plants offering miners tempting wages and full time, the continuance of cold weather, the prospect that floods may cause further loss, the outlook is not cheerful.

On the other hand, reports from Washington are that the railroads made such progress in hauling coal on Sunday that Fuel Administration officials are encouraged to hope for the discontinuance of "heatless Mondays."

The condition of New England continues serious, but orders have been issued giving preference to shipments for that section from Newport News.

Gas companies have outdone themselves supplying heat as well as light during the cold snap. Eugene C. Miles, editor of the American Gas Engineering Journal, reads in this fact "the most striking and spectacular justification and indorsement of private ownership that has been revealed in many decades."

It will be observed in the first place that the difficulty is still with the railroads; that what we needed was not a shutting down of industries, with all the enormous losses and dislocations of business thereby entailed, but a freight embargo on the railroads. The country could have stood that and the industries could have borne it much better than the policy adopted. It is striking evidence of the mischief done by the interference of the Fuel Administration with difficulties which could only be solved through the railroads. It will also be noticed in this article the allusion to the gas companies and how extremely well they have done under these adverse conditions in supplying heat and light. This is attributed by the writer to the fact that in that case private interest was at work using all its energy to meet the complications of the time. It shows in a conspicuous manner how much harm has been done by paralyzing private interests and undertaking to solve the difficulties by one bureau largely composed of amateurs in the city of Washington instead of encouraging the spirit of self-reliance and independence, as well as the ardent energy which have made the material prosperity of the United States and which ought to be marshaled behind the Government as an assistant instead of being reduced to impotence by an all-powerful and uninformed Fuel Administration at Washington.

Let me summarize the general conclusions at which I have arrived in these brief reviews of the sugar and coal situations.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. Before the Senator takes up another topic, I should like to inquire if there was any other reason assigned for increasing the price in the Clearfield district of Pennsylvania, except the thinness of the vein?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; it says here that the Fuel Administrator had announced a reclassification of certain coal-producing counties in the thin-vein district of Pennsylvania.

Mr. KNOX. Were not those veins just as thin when the price was originally fixed as when the 50 cents was added?

Mr. LODGE. They have not changed in width, to my knowledge, in that interval.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Does the Senator from Massachusetts know that they now propose to further affect the price of coal to consumers by abolishing all middlemen?

Mr. LODGE. I referred to that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator discussed that?

Mr. LODGE. I have referred to that already—by abolishing the 15 cents commission to all middlemen.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. And they propose to make a further effort by creating a zone system, under which the producers of one region may not ship to the consumers in a certain other region, a great danger existing that if that is done they will prevent consumers in certain localities from getting the proper qualities of coal that their particular needs require.

Mr. LODGE. I have heard that a zone system was under consideration. I have had no opportunity fully to examine it; but from what I have had an opportunity to examine, I am satisfied that it will make the existing confusion worse confounded.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator state to the Senate if he knows what agency the Government hopes to establish as a substitute for the middleman?

Mr. LODGE. I do not know. As I understand, they expect the middlemen to get their commission, whatever it may be, from the mine owner.

Mr. WADSWORTH. My information is that the jobbers, as we say, the wholesale dealers in coal, are to be eliminated entirely.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; I understand that they are to be eliminated entirely; but I say all these things with caution, because I am never quite sure what they do mean.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I can well understand the caution of the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. I do not want to commit myself to any decision on the meaning of any coal order.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then, Mr. President, I certainly will not press this question upon the Senator or upon anyone else.

Mr. REED. Mr President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. REED. I think I can answer the question of the Senator from New York by reading a paragraph from a paper which I have here. The Senator asked what it was proposed to substitute for the ordinary machinery of distribution. Perhaps the answer can be found in this:

> The multiplication of bureaus and commissions is becoming perplexing and distressing. We shall soon require a bureau to explain bureaus, a commission to elucidate commissions. When a bureau once gets started it throws off sub-bureaus with a rapidity and process akin to the lower biological order in which a cell simply throws off a section of itself, which immediately becomes a new cell, and repeats the operation. Much of this organized activity is moving against the real needs of the Nation. We require concentration, not distribution, of intelligence; centralized, not diffused, authority; a national brain, not imperfectly related masses of nervous ganglia. But the biological process is apparently dominant in Washington to-day. Hordes of sub-bureaus may be expected to appear at any time.

I think perhaps the biological process is the best term to answer the Senator's question.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, let me summarize the general conclusions at which I have arrived in these brief reviews of the sugar and coal situations:

Let the idea of price fixing by law or edict for domestic consumption be so far as possible abandoned.

Interfere as little as possible with the natural laws of supply and demand.

Let the international arrangement with Cuba for sugar be maintained and ships be furnished at once to bring the Cuban and Porto Rican crops to this country.

Leave the domestic and Hawaiian crops and, above all, their distribution alone. Unless all signs fail there will be ample sugar for us and for our allies and a large surplus if the Food Administration's restriction on sugar consumption is carried out as it ought to be.

Abolish the Fuel Administration and leave the management of the coal situation to the Secretary of the Interior and Mr. Peabody.

Encourage the purchase and storing of coal for both domestic and industrial use during the summer when the demand is lowest and transportation easiest. I saw that the head of the Fuel Administration had come out in favor of our buying coal yesterday. The day before it was stated that we were to have it rationed.

Above all, direct every effort to supplying rail-and-water transportation for coal during the summer and at all times.

Do not interfere with established methods of distribution and do not make the fatal mistake of destroying distribution machinery.

Enforce thoroughly the laws against profiteering, but in seeking to prevent undue profits do not permit the destruction of reasonable profits.

Stimulate production. This can best be achieved by allowing reasonable profits.

No more valuable work has been done for ourselves and for our allies than the prevention of waste and the large savings in foodstuffs through the exertions of the Food Administration. But it is well to remember that if through price fixing and interference with the regular methods of distribution, as in the case of coal, a scarcity or a famine arrives saving becomes impossible. You are forced to go without coal, but you can not save coal or sugar or money unless you have some of those things to save. I mean, of course, real savings. Imaginary savings are as easily created as imaginary prices and are of as little worth.

Do not indulge in useless meddling with domestic life and do not harass needlessly the domestic consumer of coal. This arouses anger and discontent, both dangerous to the maintenance of a public opinion thoroughly in favor of the war and is perilous to war measures. Ominous signs are not lacking of organized efforts to cripple war measures and to bring about peace at any price. Do not give these efforts aid by causing discontent among patriotic and loyal people through wholly needless and useless interference and by rapidly shifting orders which bring uncalled-for suffering and anxiety, as has been done in the case of coal.

Having thus reviewed in general terms the policies of the Food Administration in regard to sugar and of the Fuel Administration in regard to coal, I desire to make some suggestions or criticisms, if the word is preferred, upon the subject of the grant and the exercise of great and abnormal powers necessary, or demanded as necessary, for the purpose of carrying on the war. That it was immediately necessary to deal by unusual methods with the vital questions of the production and supply of food will not, I think, be questioned by anyone. Whatever the defects or the merits of the legislation passed by Congress in regard to food I think there can be no doubt that such legislation required imperatively to be passed. The successful operation of the law depended, of course, almost altogether on the selection of the Food Administrator, and for that most important place Mr. Hoover was the person naturally indicated. He had had a very severe and extensive experience in the distribution of relief in Belgium, and his work there had met with high and deserved commendation both at home and abroad. In this way he became very familiar with the needs of the allies, and one of the first duties of the Food Administrator was so to husband and distribute the food supply of the United States as to make it possible to feed the allies on the western front—that is, England, France, and Italy—whose fleets and armies were fighting the battle of civilization, were fighting our battle, and had been protecting us as well as themselves for nearly three years from the German onslaught. Although Mr. Hoover disclaimed on the witness stand the title of economist, he showed by his testimony that he was familiar with economic laws and had given them much thought. From the time he came to Washington, before he was formally appointed to his present position as well as afterwards, he addressed himself to the two great questions of feeding the allies and at the same time effecting such savings in our own consumption as to prevent the infliction of any serious hardship in the way of food upon the American people. Speaking for myself, I think that Mr. Hoover has done a very great work in the direction of the conservation and distribution of food by his arguments and appeals widely addressed to the good sense and patriotism of the American people. Feeling very naturally keen indignation at the small minority of people who were deaf to his arguments and his appeals, he was inclined, I think, to base his theory and practice in action too much upon the small dissentient minority instead of upon the large patriotic majority of the people who were only eager to help when the way was once marked out before them. Mr. Hoover's general administration in the great field of conservation was not, however, within the jurisdiction of the committee nor was it within the province of the committee to inquire into the way in which the special problem of wheat had been dealt with. We were confined by the terms of the resolution to the subject of the shortage of sugar, and there, for the reasons which I have already given, I found myself compelled to the conclusion that the policy adopted in regard to sugar was a mistake. But in differing with Mr. Hoover as to the policy of abandoning the natural laws of supply and demand, instead of trusting to the penal statutes to break up those who were seeking to make illicit and extortionate profits, I differ only as to economic policy.

In the case of the Food Administration, therefore, we have an example of abnormal powers which it was absolutely necessary to confer, and which have not only been exercised patriotically and with the best intentions but, barring the sugar question, have been exercised wisely and well and, no doubt, with great benefit both to the American people and their allies. The case of the Fuel Administration furnishes an example of large and abnormal powers which is equally instructive, but in a diametrically opposite way. The grant of far-reaching and unusual powers to the executive department of the Government can only be excused or sustained by the imperative requirements of a great war. In peace they would be intolerable and would quickly make an end of free and ordered government as we understand it. But these powers, which may be very beneficent in forwarding the cause we all have most deeply at heart, are dangerous in themselves. They should never be granted or used unless they are absolutely necessary and unless it can be shown that the prosecution of the war would break down if they were not employed. The body which grants such powers should grant them only after thorough examination and hedged in with every proper precaution and reasonable limitation. The department which exercises them should be very slow to use them and in the highest degree careful in their exercise. The mere grant and possession of great and unheard of powers to one branch of a constitutional government will not advance the war one step toward victory unless the exercise of those powers is in the largest degree able and efficient, and should never be entered upon unless the absolute necessity of the employment of such powers is demonstrated.

Epictetus said that "great power is always dangerous in a beginner," and human nature is so unchanging that what the famous stoic philosopher said eighteen hundred years ago is as true to-day as it was then. The fact that the man intrusted with extraordinary powers is a beginner implies inevitably that he is abundantly ignorant of the subject with which he has to deal. There is no doubt of the truth of Gray's familiar line that "where ignorance is bliss 'tis folly to be wise," but when ignorance is associated with great political and administrative powers it means anything but bliss for those who are subjected to the vagaries of large powers wielded by untrained hands. It has been suggested that ignorance of a difficult subject intrusted to a government officer was desirable in order to secure impartiality. It is no doubt true that the scales of the mind will hang even when there is nothing in them. And yet it seems as if it were better to have as a judge one who knows the law than a layman, and this appears to be a sound general principle in the selection of any man for the performance of duties which affect the welfare of millions of people. The instinct of the untrained and ignorant beginner is not only to use but to use in an extreme manner the immense authority and power which have drifted into his possession. He is like a child with a mechanical toy. He wants to see the wheels go around. However honest his intentions may be, however patriotic his purposes, the results of the wild efforts of a beginner intrusted with enormous powers are almost certain to be prejudicial to the community at large.

As I have already tried to show, there was no need of the Fuel Administration, no reason why it should exist at all, and the powers, however amiable the purposes of their possessor might be, have been employed in such a way as to make a bad situation worse and do nothing but harm. I know that in what I have just said I am open to the suggestion that my criticism is purely destructive. So it is, but it is the destruction which is intended to precede construction.

I think I have shown that the vital point in the whole coal problem was the railroad situation. Instead of waiting until midwinter to get rid of the chaos of the priority orders and giving a free hand to the Railroad War Board or to a director to deal with the railroad situation, we were saddled with the Fuel Administration, which could do nothing whatever about the railroad situation upon which all the difficulties practically hinged. So far as the coal situation was concerned, it ought to have been turned over to the Secretary of the Interior, within whose department it naturally came. Mr. Lane is a skilled administrator at the head of a trained organization requiring only the extension needful to deal with the new work. With the Secretary of the Interior as an expert adviser should have been placed Mr. Peabody, who was the head of the advisory committee. Mr. Peabody had been dealing with the question. He had made up, as I have pointed out, the best and fairest committee of advisers that I have heard of in my investigation, a committee upon which he had representatives of the miner, of the operator, and of the consumer. He showed on the stand, in my opinion, a wider knowledge and a more thorough grasp of the great and difficult problem involved in the coal supply than anyone who appeared before us. Secretary Lane and Mr. Peabody, through machinery which they had set in motion, had already made an arrangement tentatively which lowered the prices of bituminous coal nearly 100 per cent and yet established only a maximum price sufficiently high to permit flexibility of prices beneath. In other words, they had interfered with the natural laws as little as possible. They are both eminently competent men. Why they were set aside I do not know. They are both undoubted Democrats.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS. If I am correctly informed—and I think I am—a very large proportion of the prerogatives of the Secretary of the Interior has been transferred to other departments in practice.

Mr. LODGE. That may be the case.

It is true that Mr. Peabody by character, ability, foresight, and intelligence has been honestly and largely successful in business. I am aware that such a record is thought objectionable by some persons, but it seems hardly a sufficient reason for his displacement from a position for which he was so peculiarly fitted. I can not say why the coal problem was taken from him and the Secretary of the Interior and consigned to Dr. Garfield. It is not for me to try to scale Olympus and seek to penetrate its mysteries. It is enough to record the fact that the change was made. In my opinion, if the coal situation had been left in that way in the hands of Secretary Lane and Mr. Peabody, without building up a new fabric of clerks and deputies, a very large proportion of all the troubles we have had and of the suffering and loss which have been inflicted upon the American people during this winter would have been avoided. If that change were made now, if we were to return to Mr. Lane and Mr. Peabody, despite all the complications which have been created by the Fuel Administration, I believe the situation would improve, and that by next winter with the aid of the work done on the railroads we should be practically without anxiety as to the production and distribution of coal.

In the discussions which have been heard in Congress as to the grant of powers the argument is always advanced in the form of a question, "Can you not trust the President?" Certainly the President is to be trusted; that goes without saying. But the fact is that the President, except on the most important questions, does not and can not exercise the powers granted. They are exercised by persons to whom he delegates them in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred. In the case of coal, for example, the powers granted in the act are delegated by the President to the Fuel Administrator. Then the Fuel Administrator delegates powers to the heads of his various bureaus and departments. Then he further delegates powers to the State fuel administrators. So far as I could learn, the only absolute qualification required of these last gentlemen is that they should be Democrats, and with that qualification, so important as a guide to the management of the coal industry, fulfilled, there appears to be no other insisted upon. I have no doubt that the State administrators are very excellent men, but they are clothed with great powers. These powers they in turn delegate to a fuel administrator in each county, and I think, roughly speaking, there are some 3,000 counties in the United States and to a city administrator in the larger cities. Then the county administrator selects a committee, and large powers therefore pass in this way into the hands of county committees, and they exercise them. To suppose that all these men, scattered over the face of the country, who have never, as a rule, had any experience in public administration or in the exercise of great governmental powers, should use them wisely and not ignorantly, and use them without local or personal prejudices, is to imagine an impossibility. The city administrator also has his committee or corps of assistants. Let me take one simple example from the testimony as to the result of this infinite subdivision in the delegation of powers. On page 297, in the portion of the hearings relating to coal, we find the following statement by Mr. Thorne, a very able man, probably well known to many Senators, and this is what he said:

Mr. THORNE. Yes. I want to say here that shortly after the statement to which I have referred was filed with Mr. Nims the Federal Trade Commission wired the postmaster at Des Moines, Iowa, to report immediately what the prices on coal were August 1 in that territory. That telegram was sent, I believe, September 12. All of this is a part of the record in the Iowa hearings. We produced the clerk in the Post Office Department that gathered the data, a man with absolutely no experience along this line of work, especially on the subject of cost accounting, or analyzing evidence produced by people when they are trying to put over a proposition.

Senator KENYON. Where did he get his facts?

Mr. THORNE. He went around and asked a number of people he thought would know, and then he sent a telegram to the Federal Trade Commission. We made him produce the substance of that telegram and state the prices he wired. We then produced signed letters from all of the coal operators in the State who had written to the governor before the schedule of August 21 was established, and these signed letters showed that in not one instance was the average price at which they were selling coal as high as the lowest price this man telegraphed the Federal Trade Commission.

The CHAIRMAN. Don't you think that a post-office clerk, particularly if he is under the civil service, is duly qualified to ascertain any matter that concerns humanity?

Mr. THORNE. That will be conceded without argument.

I quote this one example to show how these vast powers are administered in practice and the danger of rashly conferring them. This is particularly true of the powers to fix prices, an attempt to set aside economic laws which has always been attended throughout history with injury, with perils of every kind, and generally with complete failure.

The danger of the delegation of powers to which I have been referring is shown in the fact that to local administrators was left absolute power to fix prices for what are known as wagon mines or "country banks," which are classified by the Geological Survey under the heading of "local" and "semicommercial." The semicommercial mine produces from 500 to 3,000 tons and probably ships a small amount of coal by rail. The wagon mine, or local mine, produces less than 500 tons, but these mines are of immense importance, out of all proportion to their output, to the comfort and well being of the neighborhood they serve. It costs much more to operate these wagon mines than it does to operate with the best machinery one of the mines of high efficiency, but by not paying any freight and through distributing by wagon or, in the case of the semicommercial mine, perhaps by a short haul on the railroads, the coal reaches the consumer at a much lower price than if he bought through the regular channels coal which was produced by a high-efficiency mine but which paid heavy freights. According to the Geological Survey there are 511 semicommercial mines in the country and 14,834 wagon mines. To leave all these small mines, which serve such a useful purpose in the economy of the country, at the mercy of local administrators, many of whom have had no experience in the operation of mines or in the coal business, appears to me to be in the highest degree perilous.

Let me now, in conclusion, speak of three matters which have come out in this investigation and which seem to me to have had a very injurious effect upon all operations of the Government. One is the danger of acting upon theories based upon exceptional cases and not upon general conditions. The principal excuse for departing from dependence upon voluntary action in response to appeals from the Government is that there is a small minority of people who are not patriotic and who do not respond to the appeal. It is common to sum up these people as "profiteers." Let me pause just a moment over the word. It was born in England and has followed the English language round the globe. Whatever may be its linguistic or etymological defects, it seems to have filled a gap. The misconduct or crime, if you choose to use the harsher word, is an old one, but the terms of former days, such as "regraters" and "forestallers," have become antiquated and out of fashion, while "speculator" has seemed not only inexact but insufficient. "Hoarder" is another well-known word employed in the same connection, but it has become difficult of use in this country, because by statute the farmer is permitted to hoard, and hoarding is denounced only when it is indulged in by some one not a farmer. There is an obvious awkwardness in using a word which is virtuous by statute and vicious in all other connections. Hence, I think we may say that "profiteer" as defining those persons who make inordinate profits by taking undue advantage of war conditions has its value and it also has the merit at this moment of being well understood. My own belief is that profiteering on a large scale by business men has practically ceased, because when practiced by great firms or still greater corporations it is necessarily very public and very flagrant, is not tolerated by public opinion, and is easily reached by law. The President has recently used the word in connection with some of the demands of organized labor, but most of the profiteering in food and fuel, so far as I can learn from the testimony, was found among retailers, and was practiced by only a small minority of that class. To base action upon it would be to base action upon a small minority, whereas action should always rest upon the practices of the great majority. Moreover, profiteering can be dealt with in another way. We have abundant power in law to punish those who take advantage of the situation to charge undue or extortionate prices and to make money out of the distresses caused by the war, an almost unpardonable offense. Let them be punished under the law. A few severe and well merited sentences of the court would bring it to an end, and we should then be spared the dangers of altering an entire system of distribution and disturbing the natural economic laws because a comparatively small number of persons decline to support voluntarily the necessary policies of war times. To alter a whole system, throw great trades and occupations into disorder and change the well-established channels of distribution because a small percentage of the population are not as patriotic as they ought to be is like using a trip hammer to kill flies. The resulting damage from this method is wholly out of proportion to the result obtained. This course should be avoided and especially when the same end can be reached by other methods.

Another catch word which has been creeping in and which seems to me full of danger, as shown in the performances of the Fuel Administration, is this talk about "essential" industries. The industries directly concerned in supplying munitions, in producing ships, in feeding and clothing our soldiers, and in aiding our allies with supplies must have not only preference but also the right of way; but where is the line to be drawn if you are going to enter upon a harsh and destructive treatment of many industries because some person in Washington dressed in a little brief authority chooses to define them as "nonessential"? There should be preference among the industries, but none should be destroyed or gravely injured if it can possibly be avoided, because the industries which clothe and house the people are necessary to the well-being of the people, and the well-being of the people is the support of the Army and Navy. Vast as is the demand for labor in munition factories and shipyards and huge as are the sums expended by the Government, they can not begin to take care of all the labor in the country or pay all the wages. That the people should be as well employed as possible and therefore as contented as possible we all must admit to be vitally important, and what they are called upon to suffer by the death of those whom they love in the service of the United States and by the discomforts they are themselves compelled to endure, by the economies they are forced to practice and from which they can not escape, are a sufficiently grievous burden, without needlessly imposing upon them the additional deprivations and suffering which would follow from the destruction of the normal industries of the country. It is entirely wrong to talk about "business as usual," but it is equally wrong to force people to needless deprivations, discomforts, and even to suffering, on the general proposition of economy in expenditures and the necessity of sacrifice being good for the soul. All the necessary sacrifices will be made courageously and cheerfully by the American people, but needless, useless sacrifices forced upon them by blunders of administration will impair unanimity of feeling, lower enthusiasm, and tend to diminish the grim determination which is imperative if we are to win this war, as I believe we shall win it. That was the most vicious feature of the fuel order establishing the heatless days, because, not content with trying to bring about a saving of coal, the Fuel Administration undertook, as appears by Dr. Garfield's testimony, to produce what they called equality, and because somebody else had no water power and no coal, to shut down mills which were run by water power, applied directly or indirectly, and factories which had abundant coal, which they were not summoned to distribute. All were involved in one common injury inflicted by their own Government; and then came a series of exemptions, published at large in the Official Government Bulletin, so as to make clear to our enemies, among other things, just what our munition plants were, and which simply enhanced the inequalities already produced by the order of the Fuel Administration.

Thus the question recurs as to this arbitrary power to say what industries are essential and what "nonessential." Amusements, for example, are not a war industry—the time may come when they must be closed—but there is something to be considered now besides the mere fact that they do not turn out munitions of war, and that is the moral effect upon the temper of the people of suddenly depriving them of all innocent and legitimate amusements. England and France and every nation engaged in the war recognize the fact that it is not well to depress the spirit of the people needlessly. The making of children's toys again is what our officeholders in Washington would call nonessential. Is it well to darken the life of children by depriving them of harmless toys and games before it becomes absolutely necessary? Would it not be better for the spirit and temper of the people to keep the children happy as well as healthy just as long as we can and to keep the people who furnish amusements and the men and women who make toys employed as long as it is reasonably and properly possible? I have taken extreme cases in order to show that this loose talk about essential and nonessential industries can not be trusted and carries with it great perils if blindly acted upon.

But there is one other much more serious objection to the legislation and the administrative action which is deduced from talk about profiteering and nonessential industries, and that is that if you lower any more than is absolutely necessary the normal business activity of the country you are at the same time lowering the earning capacity of the country, you are lowering the saving capacity, you are drying up the sources from which your revenue by taxation must come, and to which you must look for your loans. This seems to be something which is wholly overlooked. The fear, which was acute in certain quarters that somebody might make money, if carried into irrational action dictated by prejudice and passion is entirely incompatible with raising the money, without which the war can not go on at all. It is much better to allow people to make profits, even if in some cases there are unreasonable profits, which can all be taken by taxation, than to deprive them of both profits and employment and bring business to stagnation and despair. The fact is that there is a fundamental error in many of these policies which have been put forth by these commissions and by the heads of departments. The one duty of any man, high or low, charged with the conduct of this war or any portion of it, no matter how slight, is to win the war and not to promote other measures, whether good or bad, which are purely social or political. That is the error which has been made both in the Fuel and Food Administrations. They started out with a proposition that they were going to lower prices and at the same time stimulate production. They were going to lower prices, not merely prices to the Government, but prices generally, whether for export or for domestic consumption, and at the same time they were going to stimulate production. There is only one thing, as human nature is now constituted, which will really and surely stimulate production, and that is the hope of making, first, a living, and, second, a profit. The experiment was an interesting one. Prices were reduced with a blare of trumpets in the newspapers; but, with a reduction of prices, we have had a famine in sugar and in coal. We have had no reduction of coal prices, because, whatever the figure fixed arbitrarily at the mines, by the time the coal reached the consumer he paid more than he had ever paid before. In the case of sugar there was a slight reduction of a cent to a cent and a half a pound from the top price reached in August, 1917. But in certain parts of the country there was no sugar. I am not speaking of what prices might have been. It is the easiest thing in the world to raise or reduce an imaginary price. It reminds me of what Mr. Reed said once about the tariff, that "the best tariff politically was the unmade tariff, for that suited every district." The same is true of prices. It is the easiest thing in the world to reduce a price which has never existed as a matter of fact, and with these newspaper reductions of prices, this lowering the cost of living, which, with the great fundamental causes at work for an advance, was about as possible as stopping the ocean's rising tide with a mop, came scarcities and even famines, and the scarcity and the famines were facts—they, at least, were not imaginary. To have low prices announced for sugar and for coal and then produce in return a scarcity and a shortage of both is a very barren pleasure to the consumer. The average man would rather pay a little more for his sugar and have it and a little more for his coal and be warm than to see a delightfully low price announced in the newspapers and be very short of both coal and sugar.

These two articles of universal consumption are merely examples. The mistake in policy goes much deeper than that, because, as I have already pointed out, it is striking at the savings and the earnings of the country, and if you can not keep business productive and earnings ample you will raise no loans and your revenue will rapidly decline. It all comes from undertaking to do two things at once. It is not the duty of an administrative officer to promote political fortunes or political principles or socialistic doctrines. His one duty is so to conduct his department or his bureau that he will help the war in the most effective way.

But there is one other cry which has been raised, which I am sorry to say has even been heard on the floor of the Senate, that any man, be he Democrat or Republican, who ventures to criticize what he believes to be shortcomings, and who in his desire to quicken our preparations and to strengthen us in the field advises a change in organization or in policy is a friend of Germany. Mr. President, I think it will be wise to omit attacks upon the patriotism of other men merely because we differ from them as to the manner in which the war is being conducted. I think we are safest in assuming that the American people and their representatives are patriotic. Patriotism is not confined to those who have recently had the good fortune to be appointed to more or less important offices here in Washington. It is perhaps to be expected that they should be more or less dazed and overcome by the solemn plausibilities of official rank and title, but they have no monopoly of patriotism. There are thousands upon thousands of people in this country who are making the hardest of sacrifices for the sake of the country who hold no office and never will hold any. There are many men upon this floor at this moment who are making sacrifices, although they say nothing about it, which wring their hearts and which involve those who are far dearer to them than their own lives. They are not to be told by the heads of bureaus and commissions that they fall short in patriotism because they criticize, in the interest of the country as they believe, some of the doings of these departments or commissions or bureaus. It is very easy for some of these gentlemen in office to display a somewhat vociferous patriotism. I have no objection to their doing it, but they must not reflect on the patriotism of other men who differ from them on public policies. There is a tendency, perhaps more than a tendency, to make the test of patriotism a blind unquestioning support not only of the President himself but of everyone whom he sees fit to appoint to a position of responsibility. It is our duty to support the President as the representative in the highest office of the American people to the utmost of our power, but never beyond what our conscientious convictions of duty to the country and the cause demand. Many years ago in a very familiar poem Lowell wrote:

> The side of our country must ollers be took,
> An' President Polk, you know, he is our country,
> An' the angel thet writes all our sins in a book
> Puts the debit to him, an' to us the per contry,
> An' John P. Robinson, he
> Sez this is his view o' the thing to a T.

The first four lines involve a syllogism of which the conclusion, although obvious, is lacking, but the John P. Robinsons are as plentiful now as they were then. The highest allegiance, as I said the other day, is to the country and the cause and then to the President and to the men who represent that country and that cause in the field. Criticism may be false, malevolent, and harmful, just as the falsehood which drips from the lips of interested flattery may be pernicious, but honest criticism may well be helpful. The man who tells the truth as he believes it in a proper way to those charged with responsibiiity must not be regarded as an enemy by the men to whom he offers the truth or the facts as he understands them. He is laboring for the same end. He had much rather give unstinted praise, but he would be false to his highest duty if in order to give praise he concealed the truth. The greatest men are those who have always looked facts in the face, as Washington did. A truly great man is anxious to hear what is unpleasant even more than what is pleasant because if anything is wrong it is by the knowledge of it and by remedying it that he carries his cause to triumph. Absolutely complete veracity of mind is rare and is found perhaps only in the very greatest men, but any man ought to have the courage to seek the truth and not shrink from hearing the truth because it may be disagreeable to listen to it. "An uncomfortable truth is a better companion in life than a pleasing falsehood." The American people I believe are a brave people and wish to hear the truth and are not afraid to face it, although some who would win their favor seem to think so. If there is anything wrong or anything that can be improved, let us know it and let us set about the work of improvement at once. To lull ourselves with harmonious pæans that everything is for the best in the best of all possible worlds would be fatal. This is a troubled and distracted world. We are battling for the very life of civilization and everything we hold dear. We are engaged in a life and death struggle with barbarism in war and with tyranny in peace. We need to strain every nerve to win a complete victory, but there is no road to that victory except by facing facts as they exist and meeting them with all the strength of body and soul that there is in us.

WAR FINANCE CORPORATION.

Before the conclusion of Mr. LODGE's speech,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts will please suspend for a moment. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 3714) to provide further for the national security and defense, and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to provide credits for industries and enterprises in the United States necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Senator from Massachusetts will proceed.

After the conclusion of Mr. LODGE's speech,

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, February 28, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 27, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. James L. Gordon, D. D., of the First Congregational Church, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

O God, our help in ages past, our hope for years to come,
Our shelter from the stormy blasts, and our eternal home,

We come to Thee, and we thank Thee that Thou hast revealed Thyself in nature, that Thou hast revealed Thyself in us, that Thou hast revealed Thyself in the Old Book, that Thou hast revealed Thyself in the heart of Thy Son, Jesus Christ, the peerless personality of all the centuries and of all the years, and we thank Thee that Thou hast revealed Thyself and that Thou art nigh unto us. We come unto Thee to-day in one of the greatest hours in the history of the world, and we thank Thee that we are living in such a time as this.

We are living, we are dwelling
In a grand and awful time;
In an age on ages telling,
To be living is sublime.

We bless Thee for our residence in this great country, this gathering together of the nations of the earth, this family of States, this blending and mingling of all nations and tongues and races and peoples, and we bless Thee that we are living in such an hour as this when the whole world stands face to face with a new epoch in the history of the world.

We do ask of Thee that Thou wilt grant that the eternal distinction 'twixt right and wrong shall be enthroned in every heart and in every soul. Help us to believe and grant us the faith to believe that the right shall triumph over the wrong, and that eternal good shall be eternally enthroned in this Nation and in this world. Help us to sing,

God moves in a mysterious way His wonders to perform,
He plants his footsteps on the sea and rides upon the storm.

We pray for our Republic, for our flag, for the President of the United States of America, for our Senators, for Members of this House of Representatives, for our soldiers, for our sailors, and for the absent Chaplain—for all. O God, bless us and draw nigh unto us in this great hour, and grant that for each and for all and for every one of us there may be enthroned in the heart and mind and soul and the personality of each one of us a consciousness void of offense toward God and man. In this hour reveal Thyself, and grant that we may be true, true to the best instincts of heart and of soul. Lead us on in the way everlasting and grant that as a result of all the trials, tribulations, difficulties, perplexities, and problems there may come out of the turmoil and conflict one God and one humanity, a race united, to serve and to worship Thee. Keep us till the day dawns and the shadows fly away, and then grant us all admission to Thy presence at last. We ask it in the Redeemer's name and for His sake. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PENSIONS.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I present herewith a report (H. Rept. No. 343) from the Committee on Invalid Pensions on the bill H. R. 9959, increasing rates of pensions of soldiers and sailors of the Civil War.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio presents a report upon a pension bill, which will be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed my views in connection with the report submitted by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD] on the pension bill, H. R. 9959.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to file his views as a minority member on the pension bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 3389) to authorize and empower the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation to purchase, lease, requisition, or otherwise acquire, and to sell or otherwise dispose of improved or unimproved land, houses, buildings, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 3915. An act to reimburse Benson County, N. Dak., for money expended in the care of three insane Indians.

The message also announced that the President had approved and signed bill and joint resolution of the following titles:

On February 21, 1918:

S. 1418. An act to authorize the President of the United States to appoint Harry Graham captain of Infantry.

NOTE.—This bill was presented to the President on February 7, 1918; and not having been returned to the House of Congress in which it originated within the time prescribed by the Constitution, it has become a law without his approval.

On February 12, 1918:

S. J. Res. 128. Joint resolution granting to certain persons in the active war service an extension of time within which application for insurance may be made under section 401 of the act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, as amended by the act approved October 6, 1917.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 3389. An act to authorize and empower the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation to purchase, lease, requisition, or otherwise acquire, and to sell or otherwise dispose of improved or unimproved land, houses, buildings, and for other purposes.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. THOMAS F. SMITH for 10 days, on account of death in family.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege touching the dignity of the House of Representatives and the integrity of its proceedings. I send to the Clerk's desk a newspaper clipping and ask that it be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Anthony	Eagle	Hood	Nicholls, S. C.
Capstick	Fairchild, B. L.	Husted	Norton
Carew	Fairchild, G. W.	Johnson, S. Dak.	Porter
Chandler, N. Y.	Fields	Jones, Tex.	Riordan
Clark, Fla.	Flynn	Kahn	Robinson
Coady	Garland	Kraus	Rowland
Copley	Good	Kreider	Sabath
Curry, Cal.	Gray, N. J.	LaGuardia	Scott, Iowa
Dallinger	Gregg	Langley	Scully
Dempsey	Hamilton, N. Y.	McCormick	Smith, Thos. F.
Doremus	Heflin	Maher	Snell
Drukker	Heintz	Mann	Wilson, La.
Dunn	Hollingsworth	Mudd

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 379 Members, a quorum, answered to their names.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. The gentleman from Texas.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Clerk read the extract from the article sent to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

CONGRESSMEN SEEK SPITTING RECORDS, SAYS ALVAN FULLER.

Asserting that "the majority of our Congressman are here telling stories and practicing to see who can spit the farthest, Congressman ALVAN T. FULLER, of Massachusetts, the only Independent in both Houses, to-day characterized Congress as "the most inefficient and expensive barnacle ever attached to a ship of state."

In a letter of vigorous protest to Speaker CLARK against the present system of legislative work, FULLER resigned from the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department, saying it hadn't met this session.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, if the newspaper article which I just caused to be read by the Clerk stood singly and alone I am sure I would not take up the time of the House to comment upon it, but it has become quite the fashion in recent times for every penny paragrapher in the country to make light of the American Congress and seek to belittle it in the eyes of the country. This belittling and aspersion has usually been from persons who knew nothing of this great legislative body or the personality of its membership. The penny paragraphs written by these anemic ink shovers, who could probably earn ten or fifteen dollars a week [laughter and applause] usually spring from brains somewhat prescribed in their limits, both as to intellectual ability and the opportunity to observe this body, but now a Member of the body itself has been found who declares the decadence of the Congress, that it is no longer a useful body in the Republic for the maintenance of the liberties of the people and the conduct of the people's business, and because I know that the penny liners and funny paragraphers will take up what a Member of this body has said and write many funny paragraphs, because there will be old, effete men and young, immature children, and some Bolsheviki, and some scattering ignorance in the country that will believe it and thus despair of the usefulness of the most popular branch of our Government. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, I have felt you might not resent it if I commented briefly on this article or letter written by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FULLER] to the Speaker. Mr. Speaker, it might not be amiss to propound the question, What is the Congress, this body of 435 men, one branch of Congress, the House of Representatives? I believe in every instance they are chosen—they must be chosen—by a free and untrammeled suffrage of those whom they represent. They represent in the aggregate 100,000,000 of people, and they are chosen for this service every two years. They are chosen by what I conceive to be the most enlightened electorate in the world, and chosen often enough that the people can replace them, or parts of them, as they show themselves inefficient or unworthy of the place they hold. And I may say, Mr. Speaker, that the position of Congressman is sufficiently dignified, carries with it sufficient responsibility and sufficient remuneration to challenge the ambition of the best and brainiest men who are in the several congressional districts of the United States. A reflection upon this body, Mr. Speaker, is a reflection upon those who sent us here. If this body, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FULLER] has said in his letter to the Speaker, is a barnacle upon the ship of state, whose Members engage in no more weighty or worthy occupation than seeing who can spit the farthest, if that is true, what must be true of the fallen citizenship of those who sent men of that character into this Chamber. Here, sir, are being determined and have been determined the weightiest questions of state; here are being determined questions of the highest moment affecting the destinies of 100,000,000 of free people; and if it is true that the people have fallen to such a state of decadence of citizenship that they have sent unworthy, lazy barnacles to Congress to represent them, then that must give occasion for despair to those who seek the perpetuity of the Republic. And before I am willing that the people should accept the estimate of the gentleman from Massachusetts, I would like to know in what particular he can qualify as a critic of the American Congress.

I know Charles Dickens came here in an early day, long before the Civil War, I believe; I do not know just when, but probably in 1846; and he made some little light of the American Congress, but probably he was smarting under the defeat of Pakenham by old Andrew Jackson at New Orleans, or probably his national pride had been wounded by the blaze of glory in which our flag had swept the world. Dickens might qualify as a foreign critic of the American Congress, but I would like to know, before we accept this new apostle of iconoclasm [laughter], what qualification he possesses that entitles him to sit in judgment upon this great body, a body from which men have gone to the Presidency, a body from which men have gone to the Supreme Court, a body from which men go almost every four years to the Cabinets of Presidents, to fill the most responsible places as foreign ambassadors in the courts and embassies of the world. It must be some colossal intellect; it must be some man deeply learned in the history and philosophy of the world; it must be some man who has given the world some token of his prowess who essays thus to dub the Congress of America "a lot of barnacles and spitters." [Laughter.] Now, in what I am going to say, Mr. Speaker, I need not assure the House there will be no bitterness. How could a man be bitter against a man he never saw in his life and never heard of, I believe, until this matter came up. [Applause.] When my attention was called to this arraignment of Congress by the gentleman from Massachusetts, I immediately began to inquire among the membership as to who this gentleman is who was so high and holy, so pure and mighty, that he could not sit with "a lot of spitters and barnacles."

Believe me, Mr. Speaker, I had a great deal of difficulty in finding anybody who had ever seen the gentleman. [Laughter.] But that did not prejudice me against the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FULLER], because he is a new Member of this House and the body is numerous, consisting of 435 Members. There are many of them whom I do not know, and that would be no reflection upon him. And so I said that I would go to the Congressional Directory and surely I would get some trace of him in there. And I did. I found he had served a term in the Massachusetts Legislature and that he was the owner of the Packard Motor Car Co., of Boston.

Now, the service in the Massachusetts Legislature is of some value to him in this body. His ownership of the Packard Motor Co. is none. Then I went to the RECORD clerk, and I said, "This man must have been making some speeches and protests against the decay of a great Republic in order to have come now and call attention to its decay to the American people. Surely before he told the men and women of America that this body was rotten he would come before this body and make some protest, even as Demosthenes did before the decay of the Greeks." [Laughter.] But I searched the CONGRESSIONAL RECORDS in vain. I called to the pages of the RECORD for FULLER of Massachusetts, and the answer was silently entombed in the RECORDS there—silence, simply that and nothing more. [Laughter.]

Then I said, "This gentleman who despairs of the Congress surely has introduced some measures here for the relief of the people," and I went to the proper officer of the Congress to secure copies of the bills that he had introduced. I found that on January 11 of this year Mr. FULLER of Massachusetts introduced a bill to establish a common-commodities commission.

This bill is very short, and I want you to read it, because before a man can qualify as a critic of the Congress of this country he must have some knowledge of statecraft. The people of America, no matter if they thought we did spit a little [laughter], and that some of us did not get as many miles out of a gallon of gasoline as we ought to get in the performance of our duties here, would not tear this great edifice of the people down at the beck and call of a man or men who evidenced no knowledge of statecraft. You are not going to let anybody tear your Ford, or Packard, either, down unless they know how to build up another as good as that. You ought to know before you let your machine be torn down that somebody is tearing it down who can rebuild it. The following is the bill:

A bill (H. R. 8633) to establish a common commodities commission.

Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be established a common commodities commission, consisting of five members, to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, whose duties shall be to establish and regulate the maximum price which shall be paid for the common necessities of life.

This commission shall submit to the President of the United States each month a list of articles which it has designated as common necessities of life, and such a list shall, when approved by the President, be considered as the official list of articles on which said commission shall fix the maximum price for which they shall be sold.

The salaries of such commission and any necessary employees, which it is hereby authorized to employ, shall be established by the President, as well as the terms of office for which they shall be appointed.

The rules and regulations by which this commission shall be governed shall be established by the President of the United States, who is hereby authorized to take all necessary steps to see that the recommendations of the commission are carried out.

Of course, the introduction of that bill would be incongruous by any man who did not think the Congress was not a bunch of barnacles. That would entirely relieve the human family, without any further adoo, from the law of supply and demand. All he would have to do would be to have a book with thousands of articles printed in it relating, among other things, to potatoes, whether frostbitten or not, and eggs, whether more or less spoiled, and the price thereof. And if you had time, and were not blind then, to look it up, before you went to market you could tell whether you had enough money to buy breakfast with or not. [Laughter.]

I found that this bill was referred to the Committee on Agriculture. Naturally, I supposed that the gentleman from Massachusetts, viewing the crumbling of the Government with some alarm, no doubt had gone over to the chairman of that committee posthaste to get a hearing and see if he could get this legislation enacted into law. But I find that the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture did not even know the gentleman, and had not seen him so far as he was able to know. He had not requested a hearing on the bill and had not done anything in the direction at all of causing it to be written on the statute books of the country. Probably the gentleman was ashamed of the child and did not want anybody to know seriously down here that he was the father of it. [Laughter.]

Mr. VENABLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIES. Yes.

Mr. VENABLE. I wish to inquire if the gentleman's information is that the reason the gentleman from Massachusetts had not pursued his bill was because he was too busy spitting?

Mr. DIES. I take it from what I learn from the gentleman's letter to the Speaker that he is too decent to spit [laughter], and that if he did spit he would not spit far. [Great laughter.]

The next bill was to require Members of Congress, in obedience to the false clamor of the newspapers, based on false information, to pay an excess-profits tax on their salaries. Well, now, of course we all voted for it, and nobody wants to avoid any sort of tax. The first thing we did when we made an income tax was to tax ourselves. Everyone knew that for a man who came here with no income except his salary and had to pay campaign expenses every two years and go to and from Washington $7,500 a year, if he were fit to be a Congressman, was as low a salary as the Government ought to give him. But we voted to tax ourselves under the provisions of the income tax. Then this gentleman introduced a bill to levy an excess-profits tax on us. I think probably they are going to do that. Let them do it.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIES. Yes.

Mr. REED. We have exempted the State officials of all the States.

Mr. DIES. Yes. The salary of a Congressman should never have been subjected to an excess-profits tax. Who ever heard of an excess profit in a Congressman's salary [laughter], especially when he has to pay 70 cents a pound here in Washington for butter and 80 cents a dozen for eggs, against one-fourth of that amount that we paid before the war? No more foolish thing could be said than that there should be an excess-profits tax on a Congressman's salary.

Now, there were two other little bills introduced by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIES. Yes.

Mr. FLOOD. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Did the gentleman from Massachusetts follow this bill up?

Mr. DIES. I thank the gentleman for that suggestion. He did not. My understanding from the committee is that he made no effort to have his bill written into the law.

Then, one other bill was to increase the pension of some worthy soldier to $75 a month, but I understand that no brief or evidence or sworn testimony was ever submitted to the committee, and that the increase was not given.

The only remaining bill I have been able to find is one that was referred to the Committee on Claims, allowing $1,100 to some gentleman who is no doubt entitled to receive it for damages done by the Federal Government. [Laughter.]

Mr. FULLER of Massachusetts is a member of the Committee on Claims, and also a member of a subcommittee of that committee, whose duty it is to handle these claims. I understand that the chairman of that committee is not even acquainted with the gentleman from Massachusetts. [Laughter.] I also understand that as a member of that subcommittee he has a box there of claims of citizens against the Government, a number of important claims, waiting to be considered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, a member of the subcommittee, but that he has never gone there to get acquainted with the chairman or to look into the box and see how many claims are awaiting his attention. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, this gentleman resigned from the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department. Let me say that there are no more important committees in this House than the Committees on Expenditures. They are generally inactive, thanks to the fact that there is but little graft and misgovernment in the departments. They were created back in 1816 and later as the departments were created. Let us see what the duties of these committees are. As I said before, they are often quiescent. Often these committees take no action for months and months, and sometimes for a year at a time.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIES. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. The inactivities of these committees are frequently due to the absence of members from the Capital and their inability to obtain a quorum, is it not?

Mr. DIES. Well, I confess that there may be something in that. [Laughter.]

Now let me read, so that it may go into the RECORD, the duties incumbent upon a member of the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department:

> The examination of the accounts and expenditures of the several departments of the Government and the manner of keeping the same; the economy, justness, and correctness of such expenditures; their conformity with appropriation laws; the proper application of public moneys; the security of the Government against unjust and extravagant demands; retrenchment; the enforcement of the payment of moneys due to the United States; the economy and accountability of public officers; the abolishment of useless offices; the reduction or increase of the pay of officers, shall all be subjects within the jurisdiction of the nine standing committees on the public expenditures in the several departments.

I went to the chairman of this committee, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS], and I inquired of him what effort the gentleman from Massachusetts had made to have the committee take up the investigation of these matters. He said he did not believe he would know the gentleman from Massachusetts if he should see him. [Laughter.] I found that the gentleman from Massachusetts had made no effort to have a meeting of the committee on these matters. But he needed no committee meeting to institute an investigation. As a member of that committee, the great Department of the Interior was open to him for investigation and examination and criticism.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIES. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. I am a member of the committee which the gentleman says never met. We had a meeting and took action to discharge some very important matters, and the gentleman was not there. I have never seen him myself. [Laughter.]

Mr. FULLER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. FULLER of Massachusetts. I rise to answer that false statement that was made.

The SPEAKER. You can not do it that way.

Mr. STEVENSON. I would like very much for the gentleman to make a statement.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order. The gentleman, if he has anything to say, will get time after the gentleman from Texas is through. The gentleman from Texas will proceed.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. DIES. I would rather not now; just in a moment.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have not called attention to these matters in order to be funny, or in order to make a speech at the expense of the gentleman. I have done it because I believe, as a Member of this Congress and as a citizen of this Government, there ought to be something done to put a stop to the querulous, the unjust, and the silly criticism of this body. [Applause.] Why, here is a body of men that possesses more brains and more patriotism, and more information than any other legislative body on earth. How can you value anything except by comparison? Compare the Congress of the United States with any other body that exists in the world; compare it with the French Chamber of Deputies, the German Reichstag, and the British House of Commons, and I undertake to say that both in the patriotism of its Members, their intelligence, and their integrity they bear favorable comparison with any other body that exists upon the earth. I will name just a few of the Members that are here before me: CLARK of Missouri, CANNON, KITCHIN, FORDNEY, COOPER of Wisconsin, SAUNDERS of Virginia, RODENBERG, MANN, GLASS, GILLETT, GARNER; and I could name a hundred others if your patience would not be exhausted while I proceeded to do it, men who are as fearless in the discharge of their duties, men who are as competent to sit in judgment upon the destiny of a great people, men who are as well informed, and better informed, probably, on the great legislative affairs that occupy the arena of the world than any equal number of men in the world.

Why, do you know, I was riding along in my little jitney out in the park last year or the year before——

Mr. KING. Was it a Packard?

Mr. DIES. No; mine was a Maxwell. I noticed a gentleman in a Ford, rattling along like a tin peddler, and I said to my wife, "There goes the chairman of a committee that is going to appropriate more money this year than will be appropriated by any committee of any other legislative body on earth." That was the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT], chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee. Not long ago I was riding up Pennsylvania Avenue in a street car, trying to hang onto a strap, and I saw the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] hanging to a strap and wabbling back and forth, and later I told my wife, "That little fellow you saw there hanging to that strap for dear life is at the head of a committee that is going to appropriate more than $8,000,000,000 of the people's money in this Congress."

Not long ago the gentleman from New York, Mr. Fitzgerald, who was then an honored Member of this body [applause], resigned from it to go back into his profession, because he wanted to make enough money to educate his children and to have something to keep the wolf from the door in old age. He was chairman of the great Appropriations Committee that handles and has handled for years the colossal appropriations of the Government. No one ever heard a breath of suspicion against Fitzgerald, against DENT, against PADGETT, or against any other Member of this body. Honest as Paul! A legislative body without reproach! And I think that can not be said as completely of any other legislative body in the world. In my almost 10 years in this Chamber I believe I have served with 1,500 or 2,000 Members of Congress, and as God shall judge me at the last great day, I do not believe I have ever known a man in this body who was venal or unfaithful to his conception of his duty. There are lots of Members with whom I do not agree, but, after all, it is their constituents principally that we do not agree with, because a man comes here to represent the views and ideas and traditions and history of his district, and I respect the opinions of every man here, because I know that if he differs from me it is merely because his constituents differ from my constituents as well as he differing from me.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FULLER] does not look upon his seat in this Chamber as the great Speaker of the House looked upon his 10 years ago, before he ascended to his present high position—a gentleman, I may say, who came so near to being President of the Republic that at least half of the people think he ought to have been. [The Members rose and applauded.] Let me read you an excerpt from an extemporaneous speech made on the floor here by the then Mr. CLARK of Missouri. He said:

I have heard a distinguished Member of this House, now a Member of the United States Senate, say on the floor of this House once that he hoped the time would never come when the salary attaching to a public office was the chief inducement to an American citizen to accept that office. [Applause.] I indorse that. I am as proud of my seat in this House as any man here. I will stay here, if I can, at $7,500 a year, and I would stay here if you cut the salary down to-morrow to $5,000 a year. I would stay here if you cut it down to $4,000, if you cut it down to $3,000—I would stay here if you took the salary away, as long as I had bank account enough left to stay. That is because I like the service here. It is the thing that I looked forward to from a time that I can scarcely remember, when I was a poor, barefoot, ragged boy hoeing corn on a rocky hill in Kentucky.

I had never seen a lawyer, I had never seen a Congressman. I had never seen a courthouse, but I made up my mind then that I was going to be a lawyer and that I was going to be a Member of the House of Representatives, and I made good on both propositions. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The picture of that little, ambitious boy working as a hired hand, dreaming of the day when he would be here, abides with me to this day and will abide with me forever.

[The Members again rose and applauded.]

There are many of us, Mr. Speaker, who never have climbed and never will climb life's ladder of fame as you have done, but many of the humble Members of this body have had almost the same experience you had as an humble aspirant. What man would give up his service here? What man would give it up as a heritage to his children, an honorable service in the great Congress of the great Republic? I had rather hand it down to my sons and my daughters than to give them the wealth of Crœsus, King of Lydia. [Applause.] And I will say to my friend [Mr. FULLER], for whom I have nothing in this wide, wide world except charitable feelings, that in the years to come, when his children shall gather about the firesides of their homes to mention the father who shall have gone to the great beyond, they will be proud to refer to him not as the owner of the Packard Motor Co. of Boston, but as a Member of the great Congress of the United States of America. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted to do so, let me reminisce for a moment about the House of Representatives. This is not only a wonderful body of men, but a peculiar body of men. Some men come here from agricultural, some from mining, some from manufacturing districts. They come from all over the country. It is a superficial observer who thinks that each of these men has not some strong point and some strong thing about him that has justified his great constituency in making a Member of Congress out of him. I know ofttimes I have been too hasty in my appraisement of Members. I would think there was not much in them, and presently they would flash forth like a meteor across the sky in some great public service for the country. Why, I remember CARTER GLASS. Certainly I never looked upon him as a thing of beauty. [Laughter and applause.] I sat around here, Mr. Speaker, and I did not know there was very much in CARTER GLASS until he became chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee, and in advocacy of that great constructive financial measure that all the world recognizes now as a wonderful piece of legislation I saw him reach down under his more or less plebeian vestments and draw out a rapier and wield it upon the floor of this House, and it was as keen a blade as ever flashed in the morning sun. [Applause.] And then once there came from Maryland a little, short, sawed-off gentleman here, who began to talk to us in a new line about the parcel post, and I heard the Members say, "Who is that little Tom Thumb from Maryland?" But he kept talking to us, and he had something in his head, as well as patriotism in his heart, and David Lewis continued to talk until he helped to write the great parcel-post law in its amplified form upon the statute books of the country. [Applause.]

I would say to my friend, Mr. FULLER, in all charity that a new Member is entitled to have the mantle of charity thrown about him. We have all been new Members. [Laughter]. And it is one of the characteristics of this body of men, with all sorts of sense and all sorts of charity and common sense and horse sense, that they do not hold anything against anybody here. You can make a fool of yourself and get away with it, because they have all done it more or less when they first started. [Applause and laughter.] This is a very charitable body. And I will say further, Mr. Speaker, that the way to get along in this body, the only kind of coin that passes current here, is the coin of brains and of integrity.

Men come here worth millions and we never know it. I sat by the side of a man that afterwards became ambassador to France, and I believe we spit together, too. [Laughter.] He was a most excellent gentleman, and after I had served a number of terms with him and he was appointed as ambassador somebody said that he had several million dollars. I never knew it; it did not make any difference. There is no aristocracy here except of intellect and integrity. [Applause.]

We poor folks have nothing against the rich folks. Nay, nay. I wish I had plenty of money; I would like to have it; I think it would give me more leisure to study the great problems of the Government and do a lot of other things, but it would not help me to get on here, because God neither gives more daylight or more brains to a man on account of his wealth. If a man comes to Congress and wishes to win his way to success and fame, he must come prepared to do service.

I will say, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Massachusetts complains in his letter to the Speaker "that when I am with my constituents they usually greet me with the expression, 'My, you must be busy down in Washington.' I would like to be a little busy, and I am very sure if the proper steps were taken by the present Congress this needless waste could be changed into real agencies for service to the Government."

If I might modestly do so, I might suggest to the gentleman how he could put in his time. Mr. Madison, who wrote, I believe, the majority of the articles in the Federalist, laid down a number of subjects with which a Congressman should be familiar who comes here to make or unmake the laws of the country. I will not undertake to enumerate them all, but I will advert to certain branches in which a man can use his time very profitably. He might work a while on the history of the numerous republics that have existed in the world and the rocks upon which the ship of state went to pieces in these ancient realms. He might get a general view of the philosophy of history by gleaning somewhat its general phases, and then when he had finished his reading of the political side of the question, to show the effectiveness of the bill fixing the maximum price of hairpins, or some other article in the country, he might take down Adam Smith, Ricardo, or John Stuart Mill, and when he got through he might take up the study of the formation of this great Government. He might take up the discussions that gathered around each article of the Constitution; he might take up the Federalist, the articles by Madison, Hamilton, and one article by Jay; and very helpful would be the book written by Mr. McCall, once a Member of this body, on Constitutional Government. I will say that I am proud to have served with Gov. McCall. I look upon him as a great man. [Applause.]

Massachusetts has produced a great galaxy of illustrious names.

The predecessor of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FULLER], I may say to my friend, because hereafter I shall call him my friend [laughter], your predecessor, Mr. Roberts, had an honorable service of 16 years in this body and stood at the very top of the membership of this House, and in point of intelligence and in point of information and patriotism and ability. [Applause.] My friend from Massachusetts should not despair because Congress did not send a band to meet him at the station. A lot of gentlemen who come here overestimate their importance. I had a friend who came here at one time and he missed the train at Cincinnati. He thought that if he did not get here on time some of the pillars of the Republic would be missing, and so he got a special train to get him here on time. [Laughter.]

Speaking of the characteristics of Congress, why, do you know, you have not got time to be barnacles? The idea of a man being a Member of Congress and having nothing to do! Suppose he did not read about the foundation of the Government, suppose he wanted to tinker a watch without being a watchmaker, suppose he tried to run a locomotive and never had seen a locomotive, suppose he wanted to go up in an airship before he had any experience or training. Still there are a hundred and one things he can do for his constituents—250,000 in most of our districts, on an average. The requests that are made upon us by our constituents may sound silly to the paragrapher. They may write about a breed of cattle or a breed of chickens; how to set a hen; how to grow tomatoes; they may write for a package of flower or garden seeds, but their requests upon us are as important to them as the request of some business man who wants to know how to escape millions of excess-profit taxes. [Laughter and applause.] Every citizen of this Republic, man, woman, and child, has a right to call on the Congressman. Whom would they call upon? They have no other representative at the Capital to call upon. The Congressman from every district is the ambassador of his people, and it is his duty to read the letters that they write to him. Sometimes you get them in the handwriting of a little child to send out seeds. Sometimes they want a package of seeds, sometimes they want an old coin tested. Then it is that we all remember that we are their Representatives at Washington, and if they can not call upon us to do their bidding, whom can they call upon? So if a man answers all these letters of his constituents, sends out all of the literature, manufacturing and agricultural, that they want, keeps his nose clean all the time, he will earn his salary, believe me, whether he ever served at the head of a committee or not. [Laughter.]

I do not know whether it is true or not, but some one told me that my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. FULLER] never drew his salary, would not have it, would not take it. I do not know upon what theory he goes. He says he is a business man, and I think he must be a good business man. Probably he goes upon the theory that he has not done anything to earn it yet. [Laughter.] I know the Bible says that the laborer is worthy of his hire, and I know that a Member of this great body, who sits upon the destiny of a hundred millions of people, if he is an honest and fearless man and does his duty, is entitled to his salary, and I recommend to the gentleman that he take it. It will be the cleanest and best money he ever had in his pocket. [Laughter.] I do not mean by that to say that he ever had any unclean money in his pocket, but I mean to say that a man who puts Uncle Sam's dollars in his pocket for honorable and patriotic service here not only should be proud of what they will buy, but he should be proud of what they have already bought in the way of honorable and patriotic service. [Applause.] Mr. Speaker, our erring brother has formed a hasty notion of us. You know men sometimes jump at conclusions. First impressions are not always the best. If this gentleman who was elected to the Sixty-fifth Congress had stayed down here and answered to his name when it was called on the roll, had looked into the faces of his fellow Members, and had listened to the debates on public questions, had gotten acquainted with the membership it would never have occurred to him to refer to them as barnacles on the ship of state. In the first session there were 83 roll calls, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FULLER] missed 38. In the second session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, up to February 25, there have been 56 roll calls, and the gentleman has missed 33. Now, if the gentleman has never gone to the committees upon which he is appointed to serve, and even gotten acquainted with the chairmen of those committees, if he has never asked a committee to write his bills into law, if he has not even done us the courtesy to come down and sit with us as brethren on a mission of great importance to the American people, I ask him in all fairness if he should indict us for uselessness. Ought he in good charity to dub us barnacles on the ship of state? Mr. Speaker, how much time have I occupied?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has five minutes remaining.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, I shall take those five minutes to say that never in my life would I have taken up the time of this Congress to say what I have said on account of what the gentleman from Massachusetts said alone; but I do say, and I repeat again, that the idle talk all over this land, in the newspapers and magazines, that this is a shiftless, idle, unpatriotic body of men is a wrong to us who represent the people here, is a wrong to the people who send us here, and is a wrong to the great Republic whom we serve. More ought to be said about it. I am proud of my service here. May I say, in something of imitation of what the Speaker said, that I, too, fit the description of his career—that is, his career up to the time he got off the farm, not since he has been here—that I, too, in reading the school histories, Davies first, second, third, fourth, fifth, and sixth readers, in reading the great debates in Congress by Hayne and Webster, by Clay and Calhoun, and the great debaters of that time—that I, too, retired often to the barn and pranced up and down making embryonic congressional speeches, with the hope that I might become a Member of this great body; and, as I said a moment ago, I would not give my service here, I would not give my clean, unimpeachable record for integrity and patriotism here as a heritage to hand down to my children, for all the balance that I have ever had, put together. [Applause.] No, Mr. Speaker; this body is not decadent, it is not a bunch of barnacles upon the ship of state, and it never will be until the people who send us here fit the description the gentleman seeks to fasten upon us. Let us hope that in the providence of God that rules the nations of the world, the citizenship whom we represent will not fall into such a state of decadency that they will send barnacles to Congress to fasten themselves upon the ship of state. [Applause.]

Mr. STEVENSON rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from South Carolina rise?

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, awhile ago I made a statement in respect to a meeting of a committee, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FULLER] rose and stated that he wanted to reply to that "false statement." I want only a minute, but I do not propose to have that inference go out about me in this House.

I did not intend to inject myself into this matter. I am one of the new Members, and I do not believe in interfering in matters generally, but there was a statement in the paper that was read here that said that he resigned from the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department, and that the committee never had had a meeting. That is the way I understood the reading of the paper. The committee had a meeting at the office of the chairman, Mr. HASTINGS, at which were present Mr. HASTINGS, myself, Mr. KREIDER, Mr. PURNELL, and Mr. WELLING, of Utah. If the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FULLER] was there, I have done him an injustice when I said that he was not there; but if he was there I do not remember it. But I desire to call attention to this: If he was there, then he knew there was a meeting of the committee, and his statement that was made that the committee never had met was deliberately untrue, and I did not propose to charge him with that. That is all I have to say. If he was there, then I apologize to him for saying that he was not there; but I call upon him to retract the statement that that committee has never met, because if he says that he was there, then necessarily he admits that that statement is incorrect, and if he was there he knew it was incorrect, and he deliberately said so. [Applause.]

Mr. FULLER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Massachusetts rise?

Mr. FULLER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I would like to reply to the statement just made by the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman has such time as he wishes to reply.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] asks unanimous consent that his colleague [Mr. FULLER of Massachusetts] may proceed for——

Mr. FULLER of Massachusetts. Two minutes.

The SPEAKER. For two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FULLER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker and Members, apparently this is my busy day. I contradicted the gentleman—I have forgotten his name—who said that in my letter I stated there had not been a meeting of that committee. There have been so many misstatements in regard to the letter that I ask as a matter of justice that it be printed. The gentleman said that I made a statement in the letter that there had been no meeting. I made no such statement. There was a meeting, and I was there. I regret I have not the oratorical ability and composure to answer the gentleman in detail. I shall hope to do so later. But I do ask that as a matter of justice my letter and just what I said shall be printed in the RECORD, because it has been badly mangled here this morning. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FULLER] asks unanimous consent——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, may I interrogate the gentleman from Massachusetts?

The SPEAKER. Let the Speaker state the case. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the letter which he wrote to the Speaker be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask of the gentleman from Massachusetts, apart from his controversy as to the activities of this committee, whether in his letter he made the broad charge that the House was a barnacle upon the ship of state?

Mr. FULLER of Massachusetts. Absolutely no, sir.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I understood that to be in the gentleman's letter—that he made the direct charge against the entire body of the House, indicating that it was a barnacle upon the ship of state.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the objection as far as I am concerned.

Mr. FULLER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. There were at least a dozen Members objected, and the Chair will put the question over again. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not want to do the gentleman an injustice——

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask as a matter of order that the gentleman has asked to be heard upon a matter of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair heard that, but the Chair can not do everything at one time. If the gentleman rises to a question of personal privilege, he will please state the basis for it.

Mr. FULLER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I would ask that the letter be read now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows, but the House has just objected to the letter being read. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks that the letter which he wrote to the Speaker be read to the House. Is there objection?

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois rise?

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts be allowed 20 minutes to address the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts may proceed for not more than 20 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if he intends reading the letter in his own time? I have no objection to his doing that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not read it without permission of the House, if anybody objects.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If he is given the 20 minutes——

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I hope the gentleman from Illinois will modify his request and ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FULLER] have all the time he desires to say anything he sees fit to say. [Applause.]

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I so modify my request, that the gentleman have all the time he desires and in that time he be permitted to read this letter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] asks that the gentleman from Massachusetts be permitted to proceed until he concludes, and in that time that he shall be permitted to read the letter if he wants to do so. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FULLER of Massachusetts. [Applause.] Mr. Speaker, I shall proceed to read the letter.

FEBRUARY 25, 1918.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I hereby tender my resignation as a member of the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department. This committee has had no meeting during the present Congress, excepting one short smoke talk (in this respect I believe it is similar to about half the committees of the House), and, so far as I can judge from inquiry and investigation, will have no public business to justify its existence, and that being the case I do not wish by accepting the honor of membership in it to appear to give even my tacit consent to the existence of a committee which has no real, justifiable reason for existing other than to entail a needless and unjustifiable expense upon the people who pay the bills.

As you know, there are 60 standing committees in the House organization, and more than half of them are as useless and unnecessary as the committee from which I am resigning. At a time like this, when we are passing through a grave national crisis, the House should take account of matters of efficiency and economy within its own confines with a view to increasing efficiency and reducing expense. I am a business man and accustomed to looking at these things from a commonsense standpoint. I was somewhat fearful about my qualifications for undertaking the duties of a Congressman because of a lack of political experience. I find that the duties I have fallen heir to as a Congressman are of an entirely different nature than those I anticipated. When I meet any of my constituents, they usually greet me with the expression, "My, but you must be busy down in Washington!" Now, I would like to be really busy, and I am mighty sure if the proper spirit animated our present Congress that these needless committees could be changed into real agencies for the service of the Government. Why could not some of these needless committees that never meet and that are occupying valuable room and employing secretaries and messengers that have no work to do be utilized for various useful purposes, such as inspecting camps, soliciting labor for shipyards, doing any one of the hundred and one things that the Government is in need of to-day? Instead of this, you and I know that two-thirds of our committees are useless, and, instead of being really busy, the majority of our Congressmen down here are telling stories and practicing up to see who can spit the farthest.

Quite aside from all other aspects, there is a dominating element of political deception in the existing House system. The people have been taught to believe that a Member's standing should be judged by his committee appointments. According to that standard, my constituents, having no means of knowing the truth, might conclude that my membership on the committee in question carries with it some implication of opportunity to advance public interests. As a matter of fact, it means nothing at all, excepting that such committees serve to carry out that kind of pretense.

The public should know that Congress is overorganized with standing committees that do no work, whereas the basis should be efficiency, with the people getting full value for every bit of legislative machinery that exists. As it is now, these dead committees are nothing more than their chairmen, who control whatever clerical and office perquisites attach to each of them. Certainly this is no time for such a condition to exist and continue.

In this connection, it is pertinent to suggest that the present parliamentary system of the House operates to make the average Member little more than a figurehead. There should be such a reconstruction of the system as to give each Member a legitimate chance to represent his constituents and the larger public interests of the whole country.

I am making this protest against conditions as they are, not merely to make my own position clear, but also with the hope that Congress may soon rid itself of these practices which do not conform to the principles of economy and efficiency in the interest of those we serve.

The President is asking our business men to economize and become more efficient while we continue to be the most inefficient and expensive barnacle that ever attached itself to a ship of state. Could there be a more appropriate time to initiate economy and efficiency in our governmental affairs?

Faithfully, yours, ALVAN T. FULLER.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. FULLER of Massachusetts. I do.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I asked the gentleman when he was on his feet if he had not indicted the entire House of Representatives as a barnacle or barnacles upon the ship of state, and the gentleman said emphatically he had not. Does not the letter which the gentleman has just read prove that he did make that statement against the entire House of Representatives?

Mr. FULLER of Massachusetts. I can assure the gentleman that was not the intent.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does it not so read? I am glad to get the gentleman's statement of his intent, but the impression which the public draws from the statement the gentleman made in that letter is that he intended to indict the entire House of Representatives as a barnacle upon the ship of state.

Mr. FULLER of Massachusetts. I do not think so, because the subject of my letter is the useless committees, which I intended to refer to all the way through.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman advance the idea that the entire membership is a barnacle upon the ship of state?

Mr. FULLER of Massachusetts. I do not think so.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Was it the gentleman's intent to do so?

Mr. FULLER of Massachusetts. If that is so, I withdraw it now. My reference was to the useless committees of the House.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would like to ask the gentleman one other question while he is on his feet. He said he did attend a meeting of the Committee on Expenditures to which reference has been made. Has the gentleman attended a meeting of the Committee on Claims, of which he is a member?

Mr. FULLER of Massachusetts. There has been no meeting.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It has been stated here that there have been meetings and that the gentleman did not attend.

Mr. FULLER of Massachusetts. There has been one, and I did attend. There have been no meetings of the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] indicated that the gentleman from Massachusetts had introduced a bill which had been referred to the Committee on Claims, of which the gentleman is a member. Did the gentleman attend the meeting of the Committee on Claims in view of the fact that he had introduced a bill that was referred to that committee?

Mr. FULLER of Massachusetts. I did not know of the meeting.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman did not attend any meeting of the Committee on Claims?

Mr. FULLER of Massachusetts. No.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, on what theory does the gentleman from Pennsylvania cross-examine the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FULLER]?

The SPEAKER. Because the gentleman from Pennsylvania asked if the gentleman from Massachusetts would yield—or he pitched in without asking. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I beg the Chair's pardon.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asked the gentleman from Massachusetts the usual formula—if he yielded, which he did, and having yielded the gentleman proceeded to ask him questions.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. He placed himself at the mercy of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

The SPEAKER. It is entirely in the hands of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] after he yielded to shut anybody out or let them in, as he pleased.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Which the gentleman from Kansas often does.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FULLER of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. RAKER. I would like to ask the gentleman whether or not he has made an investigation of the rules as to the duty of the committees he refers to as useless?

Mr. FULLER of Massachusetts. What is your question, again?

Mr. RAKER. Have you made an examination of the rules of the House as to the duty of the committees that you say are useless?

Mr. FULLER of Massachusetts. No. I understood that they probably would not meet again, and that one year had gone by and they had met only once.

Mr. RAKER. Now, what committee or committees of the House does the gentleman say are useless?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts can proceed if he desires to do so.

Mr. FULLER of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. LUNN. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. FULLER of Massachusetts. I will; yes.

Mr. LUNN. I do not know how far I can proceed by the gentleman yielding. Was it simply for a question?

The SPEAKER. That is all he yielded for.

Mr. FULLER of Massachusetts. I would like to yield to the gentleman from New York and allow him such time as he desires.

Mr. LUNN. I wanted simply to say this, Mr. Speaker, that I also am a new Member, and I want to feel that the House is always fair. I am sure that it endeavors always to be fair, but as I heard the speech made by the gentleman from Texas I received an entirely different impression than I received from the letter which has just been read by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FULLER]. It seems to me that in the light of the letter that there was but one charge made, and that in regard to committee dispositions, concerning which the gentleman stated that the House was inefficient and expensive, and so forth and so on; but if I remember aright, in my study of recent history there have been many legitimate criticisms of that kind. I do not believe, in the light of that letter, that the severe arraignment of the Member was justified. It was too sweeping to be fair. I know the House desires to be fair, and for that reason I have made this statement. I am decidedly opposed to any Member bringing wholesale condemnations against the Congress of the United States. It is too important a body. Its influence ought to be tremendous, and it is tremendous, and anything that leads the people at large to feel that we are not doing the right thing is unfortunate. But I do think we would be unfair by allowing the speech by the gentleman from Texas to go without protest from any Member. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts will proceed.

Mr. FULLER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I have nothing further to say.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. GILLETT. On what subject?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. HASTINGS. On this same subject. I am chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department.

Mr. KEARNS. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio objects.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. BRITTEN rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois rise?

Mr. BRITTEN. To ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD the report of the proceedings of the Interparliamentary Union, which took place yesterday in the House Office Building, at which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] presided.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the report of the proceedings of the Interparliamentary Union held in the House Office Building yesterday, over which Congressman SLAYDEN presided. Is there objection?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman from Illinois kindly withhold that or withdraw that for a moment? I am interested in the subject, and I would like to see what it is.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois withdraw it?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes; I will.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. TREADWAY rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Massachusetts rise?

Mr. TREADWAY. I ask to proceed for two minutes relative to a statement of the amount of war-risk insurance.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes relative to a statement in regard to war insurance. Is there objection?

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I must object.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama objects. This is Calendar Wednesday, and under a special order the House automatically resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, one moment, before that motion is carried out. I think the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] has withdrawn any objection he might have to my request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ALIEN-SLACKER BILL.

The SPEAKER. The House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 5667, the alien-slacker bill, with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] in the chair.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 5667) to provide for the deportation of certain aliens, and for other purposes, with Mr. RUSSELL in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 5667) to provide for the deportation of certain aliens, and for other purposes. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5667) to provide for the deportation of certain aliens, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That after 30 days from the passage of this act no alien who is a native or subject of any country that is engaged in the war with Germany, or with any of the central powers of Europe and who is subject to military duty in the country of his nativity or of which he is a subject, shall be permitted to enter the United States except by permission of the President of the United States, and any such alien so entering in violation of this section shall be deemed unlawfully in this country and shall be deported at the expense of the steamship company, railroad company, or other transportation company by which such alien entered the United States. Any steamship company, railroad company, or other transportation company of any nature whatsoever, or any individual who brings in or aids or assists in bringing in any alien excluded by this section shall be fined not less than $1,000 or by imprisonment for not exceeding one year, or both such fine and imprisonment, and any steamship or other water transportation company against which this fine is assessed shall not be granted clearance papers until such fine is paid or secured in such manner as the Secretary of Labor shall prescribe.

The Secretary of Labor is empowered to hear and pass on all violations of this section and to assess and collect the fine provided herein, and to adopt such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this section.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment that I desire to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BURNETT offers the following amendment: Amend by striking out all after the words "United States." in line 14, page 3, down to and including the word "section," in line 3, page 4, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That it shall be unlawful for any steamship, railroad, or other transportation company of any nature whatsoever, or for any person, company or corporation, to bring in, or to aid or assist in bringing in, any alien included by this section. If it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Labor that any steamship or any vessel or any officer or employee thereof has violated any provision of this section, such violator shall pay to the collector of customs of the district in which the port of arrival is located the sum of $1,000 for each and every such violation, and no vessel shall have clearance from any port of the United States while any such fine is unpaid, nor shall such fine be remitted or refunded. If a violator is a person, company, or corporation not using vessels as means of transportation, there shall be forfeited and paid for every such offense the sum of $1,000, which may be sued for and recovered by the United States as debts of like amount are now recovered in the courts of the United States."

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of section 2, beginning on line 14, page 3, is to penalize steamship and other transportation companies for bringing in those who are excluded by the first part of the section. It was thought that perhaps the penalties could not be enforced by the Labor Department, and an amendment was suggested by that department that would make it workable. It imposes a penalty of $1,000 for those violating the law, to be recovered in the courts of the country in the way that such sums are usually recovered against transportation companies and individuals who violate the immigration law. In case of steamship companies that are given clearance papers they are held up until they pay this penalty. That is all this amendment is. It is merely for the purpose of perfecting and carrying out those provisions better than the bill as it now stands does.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. As I understand it, it takes away the penal laws entirely and relegates the remedy to a civil suit for the penalty?

Mr. BURNETT. That is true as to individuals and transportation companies, except steamship companies, and their clearance papers are withheld. The idea of this is that with these severe penalties the Department of Labor would perhaps not have the power to impose them. There is a fixed penalty. They can impose that penalty on steamship companies; but suppose it is a transportation company that runs across to Canada, or suppose it is an individual running a bus line. The Department of Labor could not enforce the penalty on them and they could not hold up the transportation line, and therefore they are allowed to bring civil suits for the recovery of the penalty. The imprisonment feature is cut out.

Mr. ROBBINS. May I further interrogate the chairman of the committee?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. Does the gentleman think that would be a practical remedy to correct the evil?

Mr. BURNETT. A thousand dollars penalty for each person they bring in, I think, would be sufficiently practical.

Mr. ROBBINS. How can you enforce it on those who simply assist or aid in bringing immigrants from Canada across the line into the United States, or from Mexico? I think if you do not impose a penalty by imprisonment and fine, as in the case of any other Federal statute, you are going to strike out the means of enforcing this law.

Mr. BURNETT. The Department of Labor, in recommending the amendment, says this policy has worked well in the enforcement of the immigration laws across the border, as well as across the sea.

Mr. ROBBINS. I think it will work very well against steamship lines, where you can hold up the steamship in the port and refuse to issue clearance papers; but against the railroads that run into Mexico and Canada, and against the underground methods that are pursued to get immigrants across the line, and to avoid the regular ports of inspection, I think your bill is going to be weak, and the enforcement of it is going to be futile unless you have the teeth of a criminal statute and the right to prosecute in the criminal courts of the United States.

Mr. BURNETT. The department says this provision in regard to crossing the line from Mexico and Canada has worked well, and they recommend it in this bill for that reason.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, on the 6th of this month, and again on the 13th, when this bill was before the House, I opposed its consideration on the ground that it violated existing treaties between this country and some of our cobelligerents, particularly with Italy, and that its passage through the House would obstruct the negotiation of treaties which the Secretary of State was in process of concluding with England, for herself and Canada, and with Italy and France. Two weeks ago, on the 13th, the matter was postponed until to-day on account of the statement I made with reference to this and the letter I read from the Secretary of State. I desire to communicate to the House the progress that has been made by the Secretary of State by reading a letter that I received from him yesterday:

THE SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington, February 25, 1918.

MY DEAR MR. FLOOD: Referring to the negotiations which the department is carrying on with certain of our cobelligerents regarding military service conventions, I desire to state for your information that on Tuesday last I signed with the British representative two conventions, one for Great Britain and one for Canada, and that I am now in receipt of telegrams from the American ambassadors at Rome and Paris practically accepting with a few minor changes the proposal of the United States to enter into similar conventions with Italy and France. I am not expecting that any serious obstacle will be placed in the way of early signature to these conventions.

Very sincerely, yours,

ROBERT LANSING.

Hon. HENRY D. FLOOD,
House of Representatives.

Mr. Chairman, the Secretary of State was very appreciative of the action of the House taken two weeks ago in postponing the consideration of this matter until to-day to enable him to conclude these negotiations. I am justified in stating that while the Secretary of State thinks that this matter should be dealt with by negotiation with our cobelligerent Governments and not by legislation by Congress, that officials of the State Department feel that the purpose the Secretary had in asking the delay has been practically accomplished, and I do not believe that action by the House now will interfere with the conclusion of the treaties with the most important of our cobelligerents. The treaties with Great Britain and Canada were sent to the Senate on the 19th, and those with France and Italy have reached a practical conclusion.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Do I understand the gentleman to say that action of the House will not interfere with them?

Mr. FLOOD. I stated that was my opinion. The Secretary stated in the letter I have just read that he was in receipt of telegrams from our ambassadors at Rome and Paris practically accepting the American terms of the treaties by Italy and France. A few minor changes may be made, but the treaties are practically agreed upon, so action by the House to-day would not be considered by those three nations as violative of the comity that should be maintained between friendly and allied nations.

Mr. FOSS. I want to ask the gentleman whether or not the State Department approves of this bill as now amended?

Mr. FLOOD. The State Department does not approve of this bill, either in substance or form, but the official with whom I talked thought that the negotiation of the convention had proceeded so far that the passage of the bill would not prevent their conclusion.

Mr. FOSS. Has the State Department any objection to it?

Mr. FLOOD. It has various objections to the bill, to the form in which it is drawn, to the subject with which it deals, and to the fact that it violates treaty obligations, but the purpose that the Secretary of State had in view in asking a postponement was that the passage of this bill by the House might not interfere with the negotiation of the treaties that were then in progress. If the bill had passed two weeks ago that would have been the result. That is not the case now, and the real object the State Department had in asking for a postponement has been attained.

For myself, I stated to the House two weeks ago that if the bill was postponed until to-day—the time asked for by the Secretary of State—that I would content myself with voting against it. I want to add now that I shall vote for the Rogers amendment, because it carries a simple declaration that this House will not pass a measure that violates a treaty obligation. If the Rogers amendment is adopted I shall vote for the bill, not that I think it will ever become a law, but as an expression of my sentiments on the subject dealt with in the bill. If the Rogers amendment is defeated I will vote against the bill, because I believe it violates treaties we have with some of the nations with which we are associated in this war, and I do not intend to cast a vote to violate or disregard or to make a scrap of paper of solemn treaties of our Government.

Mr. WALDOW. Does not the gentleman believe the Rogers amendment ought to be retained in this bill?

Mr. FLOOD. I do believe so.

Mr. WALSH. Has the gentleman any information as to whether any treaty negotiations are under way with Portugal?

Mr. FLOOD. I have not. The important negotiations were with Great Britain in reference to British subjects, and a separate treaty with reference to Canadian subjects, and with Italy and France.

Mr. WALSH. Portugal is in this war, is it not?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes; but nearly the whole world is at war.

Mr. ROGERS. There are about 18 powers, are there not, which are making common cause against Germany to-day? My information is that the State Department intends to negotiate treaties with every one of these 18 powers, but it thinks very naturally that its best course is to begin with the nations the populations of which in this country make them the most important.

Mr. FLOOD. The nationals in this country of many of these nations do not make it a matter of importance to us or to them.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Am I correct in having gathered from the gentleman's statement a few minutes ago that these negotiations with Great Britain, with Canada, with Italy, and with France have advanced so far that the department is now indifferent as to what we do in this bill, because it will not interfere at all?

Mr. FLOOD. That it will not interfere with the negotiations of these conventions.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Have the British and Canadian treaties reached the Senate?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes; on the 19th.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FLOOD. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Has the Canadian treaty been sent to the Senate?

Mr. FLOOD. On the 19th.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Have these treaties been acted on?

Mr. FLOOD. They have not. I understood that the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations would have a meeting this morning to consider them.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The treaties necessarily provide what nationals of these countries may be put in our Armies and how they may be dealt with. Can the gentleman then see any field for the operation of any bill on the subject? Whatever we do must be done under these treaties after they have been negotiated.

Mr. FLOOD. I think the gentleman is right so far as nationals of the nations are concerned with whom we have negotiated these treaties. They constitute the bulk of the aliens in this country who will be affected by this legislation. I can see very little need for this legislation.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Has the gentleman such information as enables him to know whether this bill is in accordance with the terms of these treaties that we have negotiated?

Mr. FLOOD. I was at the State Department, and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] was with me. We discussed informally what the treaties were. I do not think there is anything in this bill that is in conflict with those treaties.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. If we put those aliens into our Armies, it must be under the treaties and not under this bill.

Mr. FLOOD. I think that is undoubtedly correct.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, in regard to the treaty, I have said over and over again that I have no desire to interfere with the State Department in its efforts to negotiate the treaties. I stated before that they began to negotiate treaties last August. It came on up to the time the bill was reported, and then the Chamberlain bill came over from the Senate, and I went before the Committee on Military Affairs, to which it was referred, and urged them to report it, so that it would be in time for the first draft. The Secretary of State appeared before the Military Affairs Committee of the House and made the same statement on the 26th day of September as to treaties being negotiated. The statement has been made time and time again that these treaties were pending, and that this bill would interfere with them. The Secretary told the Military Affairs Committee that by the 1st of December he thought they would have the treaties negotiated. That committee deferred action on the Chamberlain bill, and I stated then that neither I nor my committee had any pride of authorship in the bill, but what we wanted was to get speedy results.

The State Department is still engaged on some of the treaties. I am not making any reflection on that department; I think the other countries have been mighty slow in this work. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] has done all he could, and I have no reflection to make on him. On the 30th of last month, when this matter was first called up, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] stated about what he has stated to-day as to the treaties with Italy and France.

Mr. FLOOD. Oh, no.

Mr. BURNETT. What the gentleman said to-day he said substantially then, that he had been called up by the Solicitor of the State Department and told that not only had an agreement between Great Britain and Canada been concluded, but that our Government was almost in agreement with France and Italy.

That is substantially the same statement that he makes here to-day.

Mr. FLOOD. No; the statement to-day goes further than that. They have just received a telegram from the ambassador at Rome and the ambassador at Paris that there has been an agreement. There have been some verbal changes like there was in the British treaty. As I stated to the gentleman, the situation in reference to the French and Italian treaties is about the same as that of the British and Canadian treaties two weeks ago, that there were some verbal changes to be made. They completed them and sent them to the Senate on the 13th of February. I expect in a few days the Italian and French treaties will be sent to the Senate.

Mr. BURNETT. That is the point I make, that they had concluded the treaty with England and Canada, and now, 30 days after the conclusion of the treaty, they have just got it to the Senate, and the Senate committee is to-day to meet for the first time to consider it. What do we know as to what will become of it in the Senate? The gentleman stated, and no doubt correctly, a month ago that the conscription of the subjects of Great Britain and Canada between 20 and 40 years of age had been agreed on. This treaty will not be self-executing, and will require additional legislation to carry it out and enforce it. You are going to find that you must have legislation to execute it. Such legislation will require time. If it takes 30 days more to get through a treaty with Italy and with France, that carries us up to the 1st of April.

Mr. FLOOD. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. FLOOD. I will say that the information I got was that the treaties were drawn so as to be self-executing in this country, and as to the young manhood of other countries, and there will not have to be other legislation. We will take into our draft any nationals of those countries between the age of 20 and 40 years.

Mr. BURNETT. It seems to me the gentleman is mistaken and the State Department is mistaken if they think the treaties are self-executing. As much so as they are when they say that this bill is in violation of treaties. It is not. In the One hundred and thirtieth United States, in the Chinese-exclusion case, where this very question was raised, the Supreme Court of the United States said:

> The power of exclusion of foreigners being an incident of sovereignty belonging to the Government of the United States, as a part of those sovereign powers delegated by the Constitution the right to its exercise at any time when, in the judgment of the Government, the interests of the country require it, can not be granted away or restrained on behalf of anyone. The powers of government are delegated in trust to the United States and are incapable of transfer to any other parties. They can not be abandoned or surrendered. Nor can their exercise be hampered, when needed for the public good, by any considerations of private interest. The exercise of these public trusts is not the subject of barter or contract.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Does the gentleman contend that that applies to the taking into the military service of the nationals of countries having a treaty with the United States which states that the nationals shall not be taken into our Army?

Mr. BURNETT. The gentleman does not remember the terms of this bill. The Chinese case was one of deportation. That is what our bill is. We have all the time, in this bill, avoided any interference with the obligations of a treaty. We only say to an alien subject of a cobelligerent country, "If you are a shirker, a dodger, a slacker, if you will not fight for the very existence of your own country, you are undesirable in this country; get out right now." [Applause.]

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, it was never contended on this floor by any gentleman who opposes this bill that this Government does not have control of the question of deportation, and therefore the case cited by the gentleman is no answer to our argument. The contention is that we have a specific treaty with Italy and with other countries that prevented us from compelling the nationals of those countries to render military service of any kind to this country, and that this bill contains a moral and a physical compulsion to render military service—a moral compulsion by the denial of the right to become a citizen: a physical compulsion by deportation. The compulsion is not direct, not open and manly, but, nevertheless, it is a compulsory military service in violation of our treaty with Italy of 1871 and in violation of treaties with other nations. I think this proposition is clear, and no subtlety of reasoning can change it. This is the opinion of the Secretary of State and his legal adviser, and I believe it would be so held by any court in the world, especially by our courts, in view of the construction put upon it by our State Department. Now, I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that I am not raising the slightest objection to the passage of this bill. I reserved two weeks ago my right to vote as I see fit, but otherwise I agreed then not to oppose it, and I am not now opposing it; but I can not allow the gentleman's contention in reference to the violation of a treaty to go by without making this statement.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD], in his remarks a while ago in reply to questions propounded to him, launched into the question as to whether this bill violates a treaty, and I will answer his argument. My contention is that it violates no treaty with any country. The right to deport undesirable aliens, as I have often said during the consideration of this bill, is inherent in the very sovereignty of our Government and could not be contracted or bartered away by any treaty. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS], who offered the amendment the other day, admitted that he did not believe it was in violation of a treaty, and yet he does the inconsistent thing of asking this House to adopt his amendment which would, in effect, submit that question to the State Department. He says in one breath that it violates no treaty, and in the next says he is willing to leave that vital question to an unfriendly court.

That is the ridiculous attitude that the Rogers amendment would place us in, and the gentleman who offered it, who, perhaps, has occupied as many pages of New England newspapers as any man in favor of this proposition of dealing with alien slackers. Of course, the legal questions involved would be decided by the courts, but who will be the primary advisor of Gen. Crowder? Who will be the advisor of the War Department on these questions? Certainly the State Department. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] admitted that the State Department would be the one that would advise in regard to it, and yet the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] tells us that while he does not believe it is in violation of a treaty, he wants to refer it to a judge who has already prejudged the case.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. GARD. I wanted to ask, after the gentleman has read what he has from the decision of the Supreme Court, whether he has any information that the present treaties, so far as they have been concluded, will be invaded by the passage of the law which the gentleman now proposes?

Mr. BURNETT. I am glad the gentleman has asked that. The treaties now pending?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I think not. Here is my contention and my earnestness in regard to this matter——

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I want to find out what the gentleman knows about the treaties. I have been trying to find out something about them. They have not been given to the public, and I do not see how anyone can know what they are.

Mr. BURNETT. That is true, but the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD], in his statement three or four weeks ago in this House, and no doubt he had authority from the State Department, gave some important facts in regard to the treaties to which I have called attention. For instance, in regard to the age limit; and if my colleague from Alabama, Mr. HUDDLESTON, will read the gentleman's speech in the RECORD, either on the 6th or the 13th of this month, he will find the statement, which, I have no doubt, the gentleman from Virginia was authorized to make to this body.

Mr. Chairman, I have all the time desired that the State Department should negotiate its treaties, and we have been waiting now for six or eight months for them to do so. Last Wednesday, after a conference with the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] and the Secretary of State, I thought perhaps there was a possibility of their being concluded and ratified by this time, and I did not make any resistance to letting the matter go over until to-day. But now the matter comes up and what do we find? The Senate adjourned last Saturday and was not in session at all. Why could they not have continued their session or at least the committee have acted upon these treaties? It was my purpose if the treaties had reached a state of confirmation by this time, if I could be assured that they were self-executing, to have offered as an amendment to section 1 that it should not interfere with treaties that had been consummated providing for conscription of aliens.

But the time is coming and coming mighty soon when there will be another call for our young men to answer the draft, and my anxiety and earnestness is, like that of other gentlemen who have been pressing this matter, that these slackers shall not be permitted again when the next call comes to sit back and say, "Me no fight; me take your job, you go fight." We not only represent native-born Americans in our efforts to rid the country of the cowardly alien slacker but naturalized Germans and naturalized people from other countries, who have been responding to this call to arms. Many naturalized aliens have volunteered into our armies to fight against their own flesh and blood. Perhaps you gentlemen received a circular from an Irish gentleman a short time ago, in which he analyzed the statement of Gen. Crowder, which shows that more of the Irish waived exemption than any other nationality, that the lowest in point of numbers of those who waived exemption were the Italians, and the British were away down the line, also. People from Canada and from England were claiming exemptions, while the good old Irishman was not. I refer, of course, to people who are not naturalized and who have the right to claim exemption under our laws.

Mr. FLOOD. The gentleman's bill will get the Irishman.

Mr. BURNETT. Of course. The argument that was made in the circular just referred to was that England ought not to treat with us, and that we ought not to treat with them to conscript their people here, because Australia twice has repudiated conscription, because under the English conscript laws the Irish are exempted, and that therefore England ought not to barter away the rights that they would have in Ireland and in Australia. But my bill says to the Australian and to the Irishman, "You are here under the Stars and Stripes, you are here enjoying the blessings of our great country, we believe that you ought to waive your right to exemption from conscription, and if you do not, you ought not to stay here among your brothers and fellows who are being called." [Applause.]

I know many naturalized Germans and Austrians who are to-day following the Stars and Stripes into the trenches of France and Flanders. Before we entered the war the hearts of those people no doubt beat in sympathy with the fatherland, but the very day we declared war they said, "I am now with the country to which I swore allegiance when I became an American citizen." I know a young Jewish gentleman in my own home town, a native of Germany, who, when the classification for the draft was going on, said, "I have a little property from which my wife and babies can draw a support if I am called, and I shall not ask to be placed in the fourth class, but am willing to go to the second class, where men with families not dependent on them are being placed." This he did, while Italians and Englishmen all around him were claiming exemptions from the draft, and refusing to fight for the very existence of their own countries. This he did also when many native Americans, who were loudest in their demand for war were hiding behind dependent families to escape the draft.

Mr. Chairman, I am not opposing the treaties, but I am showing that if we wait for treaties that are not self-executing, perhaps the ides of November will come before we will get anything that will carry these aliens either out of our country or into our armies.

Mr. GARD. If the gentleman will permit, I do not like to be insistent, but I am sure that I, and I know many Members, would like to know whether these treaties as concluded will be at all in conflict with the gentleman's bill.

Mr. BURNETT. I think not; and not only that, Mr. Chairman, but the Senate when this bill passes this House will have the treaties and the bill both, and they can properly amend them so as to make them conform if there should be any conflict. I do not want to clash with the State Department. I would rather they would handle it; but, Mr. Chairman, I do not want to see the time come when the call is made and our men have to go and these cowardly aliens escape because the treaties have not been ratified and put into execution. Gentlemen hug to their hearts the danger of violating some treaty with the devotion that a young mother hugs to her breast her first-born babe, and yet some of these same gentlemen last year voted for a bill—the conscription bill—in which there was a violation of the very treaties that they now invoke. Yesterday there was a bill reported from the House Committee on Military Affairs to repeal the provision in the draft bill passed last year to conscript aliens with first papers. We had no more right, under our treaties, to conscript those with first papers than we had to conscript any other alien, and yet some of these gentlemen who are now shouting to observe the treaties never thought then that they ought to protect the treaty rights of the man who had made his first declaration and had at least lifted one eye to the Stars and Stripes. Now, when we come with this bill and say that the man who has always had his eyes focused upon the ground, and never lifted them to the Stars and Stripes, should either fight or get out, these gentlemen hug a treaty to their hearts and say wait till the State Department can possibly, at some future time, get an agreement with those countries.

That is what you are really up against. It is not so serious in the South, although Gen. Crowder shows that in the next classification 433,000 men can be reached, if they do not escape on the ground of alienage. How many farmer boys would that enable us to keep at home if we could call this 433,000 aliens to the colors? In that respect the boys of the South, as well as those of the North, are interested. Gentlemen, when you go back home and when the next draft is called and you see the fond mother as she bids good-by to her devoted boy, bids him Godspeed because the laws of the country take him, and then she turns and sees the alien, who is exempted, with gleeful eyes and with ghoulish grin say, "I get that boy's job to-morrow," can you look with satisfaction on a condition that by your vote you have helped to continue?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. I do.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The gentleman says he hopes these aliens will be in our Army before fall?

Mr. BURNETT. Which ones?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. These aliens in the United States who are to be subjected to draft or deportation under this bill.

Mr. BURNETT. If they are not in our Army I hope they will be well on their way somewhere else. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Now, let me ask the gentleman: Suppose we put into our Army an alien who has not taken out his first papers or declared any form of allegiance to the United States; that while in our Army he assassinates a general of the Army of the United States; that we then subject him to military trial and death. What is our relation with his country?

Mr. BURNETT. Well, if he waives his exemption we get him anyhow just the same under the draft law which the gentleman voted for.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Only last Saturday a conspiracy was discovered in a cantonment out in the district which I have the honor to represent, the details of which are not entirely given out, but enough to show that a conspiracy was on foot with some of these first-paper men, and some others, to assassinate the officers of the United States Army in charge of that cantonment and other work of that kind.

Mr. BURNETT. The gentleman, then, would be opposed to the new treaties also, because, according to his view, they ought to stay here and take the wages from the men who do go, and if they would murder a general in the field, they would not hesitate to murder the wife and children of a soldier left behind.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Oh, no; I do not say that.

Mr. BURNETT. You let him stay and escape everything, and carry on his work of destruction and of murder here. I say at least send him where he can not ply his fiendish trade among the defenseless people left here at home.

Gentlemen, the country demands this law. A long-suffering people endured the presence of these alien slackers through one draft, and in the name of right and justice do not let them have to pass through those scenes again. A workingman in Alabama City, a beautiful little cotton-mill town near my home, told me that when the tocsin of war sounded last year his son-in-law felt it his patriotic duty to respond to the call, and is now in the trenches "somewhere in France," and that a few days afterwards an alien slacker got his job.

The only protest that I have had against this bill outside of official Washington was by a manufacturing establishment in Philadelphia, and the argument made in that letter was that they needed the labor of these aliens. I replied by suggesting that they keep some American boys home to work in their industries and let some of the alien slackers go and fight in their stead.

One or two gentlemen in this debate have made the same insistence as to the need of labor. Gentlemen, let us not weigh the blood of American boys in the scales against sordid wealth. Let us not measure the bleeding hearts of American mothers with a dollar mark. Let us think about those of our own flesh and blood. "He that provideth not for those of his own household is worse than an infidel."

The men and women of my district are just as patriotic as any beneath the sun, but they would deem me unworthy of the commission that they have kept in my hands for these 20 years were I to sit idly by and see our young men taken from their homes to fight and die in foreign lands while cowardly aliens fill their pockets here in security, far from the cannon's rattle. It is no pleasant duty for me to press this bill against the wishes of the President and the Secretary of State. But, gentlemen, a brave constituency has not sent me here to be the rubber stamp of any man or of any department.

If we as representatives of the people are to be mere automatons and have no right to act and vote as our convictions of duty lead us, then we had better abolish Congress and admit to our constituents that they have no use for us here.

Any man who comes here or declares his intention to come here to be a mere tool in the hands of anybody is unfit to represent a brave and honest people. So long as my people intrust me with their commission I expect to try to protect their best interests; to act for them, with the fear of God and the love of those whose servant I am as my guiding star. I can do no more; I will do no less. [Applause.] In this fight that I have been making for our young manhood I have been comforted and encouraged by many expressions of approval from all over our broad land. I will insert one letter from a representative of one of the patriotic organizations of the land. This is only a sample of hundreds of others of a similar tenor that I have received. I will also insert a portion of a splendid article written to the New York American by John Temple Graves, one of my long-ago Georgia friends.

Mr. Chairman, I voted against war and against conscription, and I have no apologies to make for either of those votes. But we are now in the war, and it is the patriotic duty of every true American to help to win it.

We now have conscription. I have advised my people to obey the law, and they have; but it makes my blood boil to see cowardly aliens who have not thought enough of American liberty and American opportunity to try to become American citizens take advantage of that very fact, while my constituents are called from homes and loved ones to fight and perhaps to die, not only for America but for the very existence of the countries of those renegades and slackers.

PENNSYLVANIA STATE CAMP,
PATRIOTIC ORDER SONS OF AMERICA,
Philadelphia, Pa., February 21, 1918.

Hon. JOHN L. BURNETT,
Chairman Committee on Immigration and Naturalization,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BURNETT: May I, on behalf of the 120,000 native-born members of the Patriotic Order Sons of America of Pennsylvania, which in two days last May furnished over 2,000 trained recruits in Scranton, Pa., to the United States Army, and who to-day has many over 10,000 of its members fighting for the democracy of mankind, commend you for the splendid fight you are making in pressing for passage your alien slacker bill?

We are aware of the opposition you are encountering. At our State meeting last August, with close to 1,200 delegates in attendance, the principle of your bill was considered and unanimously indorsed. Similar action was taken at our national camp meeting in Chicago the following month.

It appears to me that the day has arrived when "America should be for Americans," either native born or those who come to our shores with the idea of becoming American citizens and living up to the principles and ideals of American institutions.

It is difficult to understand why any of our allies should object to such legislation, for it merely proposes to treat, with the liberal option of departures, foreign-born aliens as we have already, months ago, treated our own native born by the conscription act. That act specifically applies to aliens who have taken out their first papers, but I understand in administration is not being applied to such aliens because of treaties. Members of Congress who voted for that law, regardless of treaties, are now opposing this slacker bill of yours because of treaties.

It is our contention that if there are any treaties that stand in the way of the pending bill such treaties ought to be abrogated as the treaty with Russia was abrogated several years ago and as our treaties of peace were abrogated by a declaration of war last April, in order that justice may be done to our own, as we would have it done to the whole of mankind. As a matter of fact, is such abrogation necessary? Do not foreign countries, in making treaties with the President and the United States Senate find in our Constitution, which defines the treaty-making power, a clear-cut description of Congress's legislative power? And can they object to Congress treating their aliens, who are using this country as a "slacker's haven," precisely as we treat our own native born? One may justly ask if any nation which so construes a treaty and insists that their physically fit citizens of military age and of like condition shall stay in this country in good jobs, while our own native born are sent to their territory to defend it from further invasion and to fight to make the world safe for democracy and democracy safe for the world, is worth having treaties with. It is for this reason that we strenuously object to the Rogers amendment. This is a time in our opinion when the men we honor in Congress should demonstrate to the world that we stand four square for justice to mankind and a "square deal" to our own native born and our naturalized.

The fact that Great Britain has just made a treaty with us agreeing to the principle of your bill in a way shows that you and your committee were right in reporting the measure favorably to the House last summer, and that no nation could justly object to such important legislation.

I want to extend to you our hearty and sincere appreciation for the splendid stand you have taken on this patriotic proposition, and our earnest prayer is that patriots such as you may increase in number in Congress.

For America and American principles first, last, and forever,
Sincerely and fraternally, yours,

C. B. HELMS, State Secretary.

DEMANDS FOR SLACKER LAW GO UNHEEDED—MYSTERIOUS DELAY IN BILL THAT WOULD SEND 1,000,000 ALIENS TO FRANCE IS INEXPLICABLE—MEASURE STAYS BEFORE CONGRESS 10 MONTHS, AND EVEN NOW IS RECEIVING LITTLE ATTENTION.

(By John Temple Graves.)

WASHINGTON, February 22.

The delay in the presentation and expedition of the alien-slacker bill is one of the distinct mysteries in the legislative and executive branches of the Government and of the present Congress.

In the mightiest war in which our country ever has been engaged or ever will be engaged, and with a steady and increasing clamor among our allies and our own Military Establishment for an ever-increasing man power it is utterly impossible to understand the procrastination and delay which has wrapped itself about a measure practically designed to gather and send to the French front somewhere between 750,000 and 1,000,000 men who ought by every right to be there.

It is a fact that no other legislation of nearly equal importance, of such self-evident justice, and of such vital necessity to the war in Europe has had anything approximating the delay, the apparent indifference, and the incomprehensible procrastination which has wrapped itself about this measure.

NEWSPAPERS FAVOR BILL.

Six weeks after the war began and in the latter part of May the Hearst newspapers, in voicing a simple and general demand of the friends of the American soldier, of our conscript army, and of our allied troops upon the western front of Europe, urged and at frequent intervals continued to urge the rounding up of the million or more of alien slackers who had taken refuge in this country to escape the duty and danger of serving their own countries in the vital emergencies of this war.

Other newspapers took up the appeal, and public opinion, through thousands of voices of parents and friends of the American Army, fervently indorsed the cry to the American Legislature and to the departments to speed the effort to gather and forward these alien slackers to the front—for the sake of their own nations who were our allies and friends and for the purpose of diminishing in some degree the numbers of our own men whose blood and life were being freely offered upon the battle fields of Europe.

From first to last this matter, the importance of which cried aloud to the common sense and humanity of the American people, has been treated with an apathy, with a delay, and with an apparent indifference which no American has been able to understand.

To-day, 10 months after the declaration of the war, the alien-slacker bill is still in the air, with no definite period fixed for its consideration, except in the House, where Congressman BURNETT, of Alabama, has succeeded after consistent and commendable energy in forcing a bill for consideration on Wednesday of next week.

AGREEMENT REACHED.

It was stated some months ago the State Department had requested a delay in the consideration of the measure to give time for diplomatic negotiations with the other allied nations concerned in the matter and with whom our existing treaties presented some difficulties to positive action by this Government.

More than a week ago notice was sent to the Military Committees of both Houses that an agreement had been reached between Great Britain and Canada and the United States by which the alien slackers of these countries, numbering perhaps 400,000 fighting men, could be speedily rounded up and sent to the fighting fronts.

One would have thought, in view of the urgent clamor voiced on both sides of the sea, that every agency of both Governments would have been speeded to the limit to develop and utilize this magnificent addition of man power to what is universally conceded as the very crisis of the war.

But the fact is that with astonishing delay, both in the establishment of the agreement and in the action of the legislative body, the matter has simply been referred to committees in both Houses, an opportunity which it seems should have been swiftly and eagerly seized has been leisurely laid over, and probably will be reported some time during the next week, when as an emergency matter it should have been immediately reported and immediately acted upon.

NO CAUSE FOR DELAY.

I have been unable to find any explanation of the delay which satisfies my judgment of legislation or my interest in the war. With the utmost loyalty toward the Government and the administration and the greatest respect for the Senate and the House, I have been unable to discover any reason why Executive vigor and congressional vigor could not have facilitated long ago the diplomatic arrangements which would have concluded a matter in which all nations, including our own, are so vitally interested. I can not account for the technical and personal divisions which would justify Congress in delaying action upon a question which involved a considerable portion of a million man power to be added to the allies in their supremest need.

I am sure that the Hearst newspapers would wish me once more through their columns to protest against further delay and to appeal for expedition in this matter.

I am very sure that with this matter now at last in diplomatic shape in the hands of the present Congress, the two Houses of that Congress could do nothing more popular or more necessary than to speed up this as an emergency measure with all possible expedition through both branches of our National Assembly and send it without further delay for the signature of the President.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I would like to ascertain what the parliamentary status of the bill is at the present time.

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment has been offered by the gentleman from Alabama to strike out and insert, page 3, in line 14, after the word "States," to the end of section 3, page 4, and insert an amendment that the Clerk has reported to the committee.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is an amendment to section 3 of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; to section 2. Section 3, by unanimous consent, has been changed to section 2. This is section 3 as printed in the bill, but it is now section 2. The gentleman from Alabama has concluded, the Chair supposes.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask to be recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] is recognized.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have said before when this bill was up for consideration that I favored it. I do not wish to be thought to be in the position of a Greek bearing gifts. I sincerely echo the sentiments which the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] has just voiced. I hope that this bill will speedily be passed and become law.

On two different occasions I have found on my desk in the morning a letter signed by the gentleman from Alabama, which I assume was sent to most Members of the House, in which he called upon Members to vote against the "vicious Rogers amendment." It is not entirely clear from the language whether he was characterizing the offerer or the amendment, but I am willing to accept the gentleman's assurance that he was referring to the amendment and not to the author of the amendment. [Laughter.]

But, Mr. Chairman, let us see what this "vicious" amendment is, if we accept the construction of that phrase which I prefer. Let us see what iniquity is proposed in the "vicious Rogers amendment." My amendment is as follows:

Insert the following after the word "citizens," page 2, line 4:

"Provided, That this act shall not be construed to supersede the provisions of any existing treaty with such country, the terms of which stipulate that the United States shall not subject the subjects of such country to compulsory military service."

Mr. Chairman, we have a treaty with Italy, made in 1871, and in force to-day, by which each country stipulates that it will not subject the subjects of the other residing within its borders to compulsory military service. Is it "vicious" to suggest that as a Nation we are in honor bound to observe the terms of that solemn covenant? I should expect that Von Tirpitz or Von Hindenberg would characterize my amendment as vicious, but I am very much surprised, I confess, to find that sentiment voiced by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT]. My amendment simply and solely proposes that we as a Nation shall keep our solemnly plighted word.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Certainly.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts contend that this amendment in any way supersedes the treaties we have in force? Is there any necessity for the Rogers amendment?

Mr. ROGERS. I am frank to say that my judgment, after such study as I have been able to give the question, is that the Burnett bill is not in violation of the treaty with Italy or of any other existing treaty. In that respect the gentleman from Alabama was entirely correct in quoting me as thinking that the Burnett bill does not violate any treaty.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Is there any necessity for the interpolation of this amendment?

Mr. ROGERS. I am not an international lawyer. I have not been intrusted by the President of the United States with the task of administering our foreign relations. That function has been put not upon me, not upon the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT], but upon the Secretary of State and upon the Department of State. The Secretary of State has definitely and positively said that in his judgment the Burnett bill does violate the Italian treaty. If that is true, we ought in honor to retain my amendment, and thus to save the United States Congress from being open to the charge of having deliberately made the Italian treaty a "scrap of paper."

Mr. McCULLOCH. Is there any other reason why the gentleman believes we should give the Italian the benefit of the doubt?

Mr. ROGERS. We are not going to give the Italian the benefit of the doubt. We have made a treaty with Italy. That treaty is in force. There is a prescribed and orderly way by which we can proceed to abrogate that treaty. But we have not the right as an honorable Nation, which is appearing before the world as the exponent of the doctrine of the maintenance of treaties, to fly in the face of that treaty so long as it is in force. We can not as a Nation be a champion of the "scrap of paper" doctrine. We are at war at this moment with a nation because we can not trust her to observe the treaty obligations into which she has entered.

Mr. DOWELL. Does not the Secretary of State in the communication read here to-day approve of the bill that is now before the House for consideration?

Mr. ROGERS. The gentleman from Iowa knows, of course, that the amendment to which I have alluded, and of which I am the author, is already in the bill.

Mr. DOWELL. But without reference to that amendment?

Mr. FLOOD. No.

Mr. ROGERS. Perhaps the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD], the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, who has talked with the Secretary of State, as I have not recently talked with him, can answer the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FLOOD. The Secretary of State simply says in his letter that the negotiations that were in progress in regard to these treaties had been practically concluded; two of them had been signed and sent to the Senate and the other two were almost entirely completed, with the exception of some minor changes. He did not approve the bill. But I want to ask the gentleman if I understand his position correctly. During the last two or three weeks we have been discussing this bill he has expressed himself as heartily in favor of it and did not concur in the view expressed that the bill violated the Italian and Japanese treaties, but yielded his judgment in that respect to the positive statement of the Secretary of State and his legal adviser that it did violate the Italian treaty. He does not want to put his country in the position of violating a treaty, where there is any doubt, and there must be doubt when our own State Department would have to decide against our position. Is that the gentleman's position? I think it is highly honorable and patriotic.

Mr. ROGERS. That is not exactly my position, but perhaps it approximates an accurate statement.

I think we must trust the State Department to administer the affairs of state. Now, the State Department has in a preliminary way, at least, expressed the opinion that this Burnett bill violates the Italian treaty. I do not think it does. I do not think it follows, when the question comes squarely before the State Department, when the State Department must consider the question and reach a decision, that it will itself adhere to its informal opinion. But my position is that we in this House must beyond peradventure exclude the possibility of violating our solemn troth. For that reason we must write into this bill a simple provision excluding any intent upon our part to break our given word.

Mr. BURNETT. Did not the gentleman vote for the draft bill, and did not we violate a treaty in regard to the drafting of aliens with first papers?

Mr. ROGERS. I voted for the draft bill, and the gentleman voted against it.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KAHN. It is true there was a provision in the draft bill which violated some of our treaties, but the Committee on Military Affairs yesterday reported out a bill to correct that, so that we would not be in that invidious position.

Mr. BURNETT. What the gentleman from Massachusetts said is correct, and I stand on that.

Mr. ROGERS. I will say to the gentleman from Alabama that the international phase of the question was not presented to me and I do not recall that it was presented to the House last April or May, at the time the draft bill was before the House.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. KEARNS. Is the Italian Government objecting to this bill on account of the fact that it is in contravention of some treaty that we have with Italy?

Mr. ROGERS. The chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs says that the Italian ambassador declares that this bill violates the treaty of 1871 between the United States and Italy. But the Italian Government has negotiated a treaty with England for the service in the armies of England of Italian subjects resident in England, and vice versa. There is no question that Italy is willing and indeed eager to enter into an agreement with us similar to that which she has entered into with Great Britain and which we have entered into with Great Britain and Canada. But she desires to do it in her own way. She will quite naturally deplore legislation by Congress which she says unblushingly contravenes a treaty with her, nearly 50 years old, and hitherto scrupulously regarded by both countries.

Mr. Chairman, if this Burnett bill does not violate any treaty, it can do no possible harm to state fairly and squarely that we propose to keep our plighted word. If the Burnett bill does violate a treaty, I have too great faith in the honor of the membership of this House to believe it will not indorse an amendment preventing any such Prussianism in our legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired. The debate on this section is exhausted.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, if the debate is exhausted, how comes it the gentleman from Massachusetts got time?

The CHAIRMAN. By unanimous consent.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I did not hear anything about unanimous consent, but I will ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can move to strike out the last word.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I will do that. I thought the chairman referred to some agreement. I move to strike out the last word in the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, there are two questions involved in the pending measure. One is a question of authority, or power, the other a question of propriety.

I think we are all agreed, whether we favor, or oppose this bill, that if it proposes in any wise to do anything that infringes a treaty, or is in derogation of our national honor, we are, one and all, opposed to it. With respect however to the question of power, I wish to take issue with the contention that has been advanced to the effect that we lack the authority to enact this legislation. In this connection I desire to say that should we chose to exercise our constitutional power—and I do not suggest for a moment that we should do this, if the propriety of its exercise is in doubt—it is perfectly competent for the Congress to avoid every existing treaty. The discussion upon this bill seems to have proceeded, for a time at least, upon the theory that if there is a valid subsisting treaty, we are powerless to take any steps in contravention of its provisions. Nothing could be further from the fact. Congress has the right to pass bills that relate to and provide for the common defense. It has the right to provide for the establishment and maintenance of armies and navies. Further, it has the right to take all the steps necessary to make effectual the powers specifically confided to it by the Constitution. Hence, when the Congress enacts a law in conformity with the Constitution, that law becomes paramount law.

Under the Constitution the President can negotiate a treaty. When that treaty is ratified by the Senate, that treaty becomes paramount law. Both laws are paramount, and if they happen to conflict, the one that is later in point of time, operates a repeal pro tanto of the prior enactment.

The inquiry has been propounded here to-day whether the bill under consideration will violate the treaties that are pending in the Senate. Why, of course not. Whatever may be enacted in the way of statute law, prior to the ratification of treaties negotiated by the Senate, and in conflict with the terms of those treaties will, immediately upon their ratification, be thereby abrogated. So that it is utterly impossible for us by any present action to violate a treaty which is inchoate, which is as yet in the womb of the future, and which, when ratified will thereby, by that very act, abrogate all antecedent and conflicting legislation.

But, Mr. Chairman, while it is perfectly true, as I said, that the Congress possesses ample authority to abrogate the treaty with Italy, without giving that country notice of our intention to that effect, I do not for a moment suggest such a course. As a matter of propriety and national honor, we should hold to the view which is the general view of the modern world, with one flagrant and odious exception, that treaties ought not to be regarded as "scraps of paper," but maintained as solemn and binding obligations. If there is anything in the proposed legislation that is in derogation of our treaty with Italy or of our treaties with any other country the way of our duty is manifest. With one voice this legislation should be rejected. But, Mr. Chairman, I wish to dissent in the most emphatic terms from a suggestion heretofore projected into this debate to the effect that this body should be controlled in its judgment of the constitutionality of pending legislation by the views entertained with respect to such legislation by the State, or any other department of the Government. We are a coordinate branch of the Government, and in connection with the enactment of laws, it is a part of our constitutional function to determine for ourselves whether acts under consideration are, or are not constitutional.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Suppose a treaty had been entered into with the usual good faith, which required six months' notice of intended abrogation, and we should pass a law in advance of that six months' notice. Would the gentleman regard that as an act of good faith toward another Government?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Certainly not. As a matter of power, we could take such action. But I have just said that if there is anything in the pending bill that is in derogation of any existing treaty, then as a matter of national honor, and high propriety, the bill should be rejected.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In connection with the treaty with Russia, Congress did act but it gave notice that it intended to abrogate the treaty.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes. That was the proper thing to do—and we did it, but we could have abrogated the treaty without any preliminary notice.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would not the State Department be put in the position of violating a treaty if this House were to pass a bill not in accordance with the treaty?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. But if this bill does not violate a treaty, how will its enactment put the State Department in the situation suggested by the gentleman's question?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is true if it does not violate the treaty; but the suggestion has been made that this bill does.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I intend to discuss that suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I dissent in toto from the view that the suggestion by the Secretary of State, or the Secretary of the Interior, or the Secretary of any other department, that pending legislation is unconstitutional, should cause this body to abandon its own well-considered opinions, fold its hands, so to say, and discontinue its legislative activities on the subject under consideration. That would be a surrender of our proper constitutional function.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS or Virginia. I yield, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MADDEN. What is the fact with respect to the terms of the treaty? Would this law in fact violate the terms of the treaty?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. No. I intend to discuss this question of suggested conflict, but preliminary to that discussion I wished to say a word or two with respect to what I deem to be the proper constitutional authority, and the appropriate action of this body when engaged in the enactment of legislation presenting constitutional, or other difficulties.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That brings up the question that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] has raised. Should not the bill include some notice that we intend to abrogate the treaty?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes, if we proposed to abrogate a treaty.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Rather than simply pass it without notice?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. But if we do not propose to abrogate a treaty, why should any notice be given? If we are perfectly clear that our legislation will not be in abrogation of a treaty, why should we discount the sincerity of our action by giving a notice that is proper to be given only when the abrogation of a treaty is in contemplation?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Our treaty may say "We will give you six months' notice." but our bills says "We will give you no notice." That is the point.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. If we do propose to abrogate a treaty, why should we give a notice of abrogation? I deny that by this act we will violate any treaty, or moral obligation.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Have any of these other powers intimated that we are violating the treaty? Does the gentleman know whether they insist that we are likely to?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I have heard it stated on the floor of the House that the Italian Government or some representative of that Government has intimated that the pending bill is in violation of our treaty with Italy.

Mr. GALLIVAN. But the gentleman does not know whether that is official or not.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Pardon me, for a moment—I have wondered since hearing this statement whether it did not relate to the bill as it was originally reported, and not to the bill in its present form. The bill reported by the committee contained a provision for the conscription of aliens. Should we pass the bill with this provision included, it would clearly be in violation of the Italian treaty. Congress would have the authority to pass it, even in that form, but good faith and national honor forbid such action. The offending section has been stricken from the bill.

Mr. GALLIVAN. But the gentleman can not say with any certainty that any of these powers have intimated that the present act under consideration violates any treaty.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I know nothing more than what has been stated on this floor. No protest from the Italian Government has been presented to this body or to the Senate, certainly so far as I am aware. The statement to which I referred was made in debate two weeks ago. I do not even know whether this statement could now be made, in view of the present form of the bill.

Mr. GALLIVAN. I notice that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs has just returned to the Chamber, and I hope he will answer the question which I have just put to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Now, Mr. Chairman, I stated a moment ago that if this House is sure of its ground and firmly of opinion that this legislation is constitutional and morally proper, it should not be deterred from action by difficulties suggested by the functionaries of another department. Should this body decline to take the action that its own judgment and conscience suggest, when confronted with the critical suggestions, and opposing views of officials in other branches of the Government, much wholesome legislation would remain unenacted. I well recall that when the Webb-Kenyon bill was before this body, the Attorney General of the United States pronounced that measure to be unconstitutional, and so advised the then President. Later that President vetoed the bill on the ground of unconstitutionality. In the exercise of our own proper authority, and fully persuaded that the bill was constitutional the Congress proceeded to pass the same over the President's veto. What was the sequel of that action? The Supreme Court sustained the constitutionality of the act in a decision of the most sweeping possible character, thereby fully vindicating the judgment of the Congress against the opposing view of the Attorney General and the President.

So much then for the suggestion that this body ought to hesitate to act, merely because an official, or officials at the departments maintain an opposing view upon questions that we are perfectly competent to determine. These preliminary remarks may serve to draw attention to the fact that on the question of the constitutionality of this bill, we should exercise our own judgment, and not be frightened away, or deterred from taking action on the suggestion that the Secretary of State differs with us with respect to the propriety and constitutionality of this legislation. We respect the judgment of the Secretary, but we must act on these high matters on our own judgment, and following the suggestions of our own consciences.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I have been interrupted so much by questions that I will ask for 10 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Returning to the discussion of the propriety of this bill it will be noted, on examination, that what the treaty with Italy denounces is the conscription of Italians in this country.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. While we are not providing for the conscription of the nationals of Italy in this bill, we are in effect doing that same thing, are we not?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Not at all, but that is the very question I am now proposing to discuss, and which I have started several times to discuss, but from which I have been diverted by the questions which have been propounded. Looking, as I have said, to the treaty, it will be seen that it specifically provides against the conscription of the subjects of Italy in the United States. There is not a line of this bill in its present form which provides for conscription. It relates to a situation which, it is fair to say, neither of the contracting parties had in mind at the time the treaty was negotiated, and a situation therefore with respect to which the minds of the contracting parties never met.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Does not the joint resolution deal with the condition created by the conscription law, to wit, the status of men who have registered but pleaded their rights under the treaty; does not the joint resolution impose pains and penalties on men who plead their rights under that very treaty?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I will endeavor to answer this, and all other questions frankly and fully. As I have said, the situation that now confronts us is one that was never fairly in contemplation by the parties to the treaty. We are at war, with Italy on our side. This war presents possibilities of far graver consequences to Italy, than to this country. Victory will mean more to that country than to the United States. Under war conditions we find hundreds of thousands of aliens in the United States, the subjects of other countries engaged in a life and death struggle, but who are neither aiding this country, nor the countries to which they owe allegiance. They have scorned to become naturalized citizens of the United States. They are beyond our authority for the purposes of waging war. They are fighting neither in the armies of this Republic, or of the motherland to which they belong.

This Republic is conscripting the sons of America to fight the battles of America, and incidentally the battles of the countries to which these aliens belong. What does this mean for the native American, this inability to put on the firing line either in the armies of the United States or of our allies, this vast aggregate of aliens? It means that in every community of the United States, where these aliens are found, they constitute an occasion of irritation, of dissatisfaction, and of heartburning. It breaks down that solidarity of sentiment, so essential to the successful conduct of the war, its successful prosecution, and speedy conclusion. We should be at this time a united people, free from the canker of irritating comparisons. How can this state of mind exist when in so many communities American parents see their boys going to war, when aliens protected by treaties from conscription, remain to hold their jobs? This is the situation that confronts us. What are we going to do about it? Can we conscript these people? No. Existing treaties hinder us from taking that action. What then? Are our powers as a sovereign nation paralyzed in all other directions? Are we hindered from taking action on lines not covered by these treaties? Of course not. We can not move in any direction where these treaties block the way, but in all other respects we are still sovereign, and can exercise all of the attributes of sovereignty. What then can this country do, in this time of critical exigency? The answer is easy.

We can say to these aliens who cause heartburnings, these aliens whose presence in so many communities is a festering sore, that while we can not conscript them and put them into the Armies of the Republic, side by side with our sons, we can invite them to withdraw from our country. We can say to them that their further presence is not desirable under present conditions. We can say to them that they are hindering us in the great task of winning the war, by preventing a continuous contrast between their favored condition, and that of our sons in the trenches of Europe. They are neither with us, nor with their own countries. We can not conscript them, and their own countries can not reach them. Under these conditions they are not desirable inmates of our country. They are an offense, and a stumbling block. Have we no right under these circumstances to invite them to withdraw or if they wish to remain to come into our Armies? Why not? Is it possible that we have ever agreed to any treaty which renders it impossible for this country in the exercise of its sovereign powers to invite undesirable persons to withdraw from our borders, and if necessary to deport them?

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. Does the gentleman mean that he actually wants to deport these people?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes, if necessary.

Mr. PLATT. You could not run the coal mines of Pennsylvania three weeks without them.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. It is more important to have soldiers at the front, than to maintain aliens to dig coal in Pennsylvania. I am more interested in our own boys, our patriotic native born Americans, than in alien coal miners. If these people were in our armies, or the armies of the countries to which they owe allegiance, it would not be necessary for so many of our young men to be drafted.

Mr. PLATT. You can not win the war without the operation of the coal mines.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The gentleman is getting away from the question of our authority and rights under the treaties.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Is it the gentleman's judgment that the Government of the United States can not win this war without drafting aliens into the military service?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. We can win this war without the aliens, but as a matter of justice to American boys, I wish to see these people either fighting in the armies of this country to which they have come of their own choice, or in the armies of the allies' countries to which they owe allegiance. Should our boys fight in Europe to make this country a safe domicile for aliens, where they may wax fat, and flourish, secure against danger?

Mr. GORDON. The gentleman is a good lawyer, but he has not answered my question.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I have stated that we can win the war, without calling upon the aliens. But I desire to call upon them.

Mr. GORDON. What authority have we to force aliens into the Army?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. We are not seeking to conscript them. We give them a choice.

Mr. GORDON. You are or you are driving them out of the country.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. We say to them "Your presence is not desirable under these circumstances but if you choose to enter our armies, and fight shoulder to shoulder with our boys, you will by that act, remove the objection to your continued presence."

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. No, I can not yield further. My only reason for not yielding is that I have already been obliged to ask one or two extensions, and I do not care to ask for further time.

Mr. FESS. I wanted to ask the gentleman a question on this line.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Very well, I will yield.

Mr. FESS. I want the gentleman's opinion as a lawyer upon one question upon which I am considerably confused in my mind. I am in sympathy with what the gentleman is saying, and still I am withholding my support because of some doubt.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. What is the gentleman's doubt?

Mr. FESS. Suppose the bill is passed with the Rogers amendment; we can not do under the law with that amendment what I think my friend would like to do.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Not if construed by a hostile department, no.

Mr. FESS. In case the law is passed and the negotiations of the State Department will relieve inability by treaty, must there be some additional legislation in order to make it operative upon the person that it is now inoperative upon because of treaty obligations?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The difficulty in answering that question is that we do not know what the provisions of the treaty will be. I have pointed out that even should this bill become law, any subsequently ratified treaty will be the law of the land, and will override all antecedent laws of the land, just as this bill if passed, will be the law of the land, and repeal all other laws with which it may happen to conflict.

Mr. FESS. Then the law as passed to-day would be operative on cases that the treaty now would forbid if a future treaty would relieve it?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. This law would not operate against any treaty ratified subsequent to its enactment. Taking up again the thread of my argument, I repeat that we can say to these aliens, "We do not want you in this country under present conditions. You neither wish to fight with us, nor with your native country. Under these circumstances we will be glad for you to withdraw." To this statement we can add the further statement that if, preferably to withdrawing, they are willing of their own motion to become a part of the military force of this country, we are willing for them to remain. This puts the matter up to them—as a matter of voluntary choice. You may say that the choice is a hard one. That may be, but it does not touch the question of our right in the premises.

It is competent for this country to remove them without giving them the choice of coming into our armies. I suppose that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] will agree that morally, and constitutionally we possess that authority. The greater always includes the less. If as a matter of authority, and without violation of propriety, we can deport these aliens as undesirables, then assuredly we enjoy the lesser power to give them the opportunity to remain, by becoming by voluntary action a part of the armies of the Republic, thereby removing the objection to their continued presence. That is all this bill proposes to do.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. FLOOD. Suppose a Member of Congress thought that it did infringe the treaty?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Then, he ought to vote against it, just as every Member who thought that the Webb-Kenyon bill was unconstitutional, ought to have voted against it.

Mr. FLOOD. Is it not a fact that this country has negotiated a treaty with Italy that covers this proposition, and does not that take it out of the question of whether we are violating the treaty or not?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. No; because the old treaty with Italy endures until the proposed treaty is ratified. We do not know when that ratification will take place. In the meantime, and by way of anticipation we ought to take some action.

Mr. FLOOD. The gentleman does not suppose that the Senate of the United States would at the same time ratify a treaty negotiated between this country and Italy and pass a law that violated that treaty, does he?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I will say this, and it is an answer to many of the questions that have been propounded: Why concern ourselves with possible conflicts between this bill, and the treaty now being negotiated with Italy, when both the new treaty and this bill will be before the Senate. That body will be in a position to take care of any conflicts, and make the necessary reconciliations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has again expired.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. I would like to know if the gentleman believes that strict good faith permits us to do indirectly what our entire good faith declares we ought not to do directly?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. There is no answer to that, but no.

Mr. HARDY. If this law would by moral compulsion enforce conscription, if it would force these people into the Army although we can not conscript them, are we not keeping the letter of the law and breaking the spirit?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. No. Whatever is not covered by the treaty either in terms, or spirit, can be dealt with by appropriate legislation. I have tried to point out that doubtless what the Italian Government had in mind, when it objected to this bill was the second section of this bill, the one that provided for conscription. But that section has been stricken out. Neither the Italian Government, nor any other Government could suppose for a moment that this country had ever surrendered its right to deport undesirable aliens. The right is of the essence of national authority. I have tried to point out how undesirable these aliens are under present conditions, when they can not be reached either by this Government, or their own. I will ask the gentlemen who have asked me so many questions, whether they question the power or the right of the United States Government to invite these aliens to go, and to remove them if necessary. I take it for granted there is not a Member of this body who would claim——

Mr. GORDON. I challenge it myself.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Then in the gentleman's own time I hope he will support his contention.

Mr. GORDON. If I can get the time, I shall explain why.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. If we possess this power of removal how can it be in anywise considered that we run afoul of the treaty when we give the alien an opportunity of his own choice to stay with us? That is all we propose to do. We have the power and the moral right to remove them, but we say to them, "If you do not wish to be deported but prefer as a matter of choice to stay in the United States and become one of us in this war, you may exercise that choice." The question of whether it is a hard choice, is not relevant or important. It may be a harsh action toward these aliens to remove them, when they would so much prefer to stay safely in this country far from war's alarms, while our boys are in France, but it could not be argued that the power of deportation is lacking, merely because its exercise would press hardly upon the persons deported.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Chairman, is it the gentleman's opinion that the Rogers amendment should be eliminated from this bill?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I do not think it should have been put upon the bill. We might just as well have put upon the Webb-Kenyon bill that it should not be operative, if it was held to be in violation of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. McCULLOCH. The gentleman regards the Rogers amendment as unconstitutional?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I voted against it, and I think it ought to be eliminated. However I do not believe that if this amendment remains as a part of the bill, it will operate to kill it. It is not expected that this bill should be enforced if it is in violation of a treaty.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes, I will yield.

Mr. HARDY. Does the gentleman recognize that there is duress in this bill? Would not the gentleman make the same defense of a provision in this bill which would say that any alien of this class who should refuse to volunteer might be imprisoned for six months?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. No, the situation is entirely different. There is a measure of duress in this measure, but it is duress with respect to a matter that is within our constitutional authority, and within our moral rights.

Mr. HARDY. Would not the gentleman recognize we had the constitutional authority to imprison a man who refused to volunteer?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. But not the moral right. I was careful to include both of them in my answer. I have undertaken to maintain the proposition that this bill is neither a violation of moral propriety, or a treaty obligation.

Mr. KEARNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I will.

Mr. KEARNS. Then the conscription law which we passed to conscript American boys, there was duress in that, also?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Of course, of the most direct and effective kind.

Mr. KEARNS. In that if he refused to be conscripted we could put him in jail.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. We have no right to use duress to compel something to be done that can not, and ought not to be done directly. But when moral propriety does not interfere with the exercise of constitutional authority, then in the exercise of that authority we can use duress. We have the constitutional authority to deport these aliens, if we regard them as undesirable, and their presence under present conditions as a hindrance to the successful prosecution of the war. No treaty obligation, or moral duty interferes with the exercise of this authority. This being so this country can put up to these aliens, call it duress if you will, the choice between deportation and service by voluntary action, in the Armies of the United States.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS], in answer to my question a moment or two ago, stated that he did not believe that this measure in any way supersedes our treaties with the nations concerned. That being true, what is the advantage or necessity of the so-called Rogers amendment? It can do no good and may do much harm. I believe it should be eliminated from the bill.

Mr. Chairman, this proposition embodied in the bill under discussion deals solely with the right of America to classify and deport undesirable aliens. Surely it is a gross violation of all the principles of fairness and justice to permit the citizens and subjects of our allied nations, who have taken all the advantages of an American welcome to this country, to now refuse to serve either their native land or their adopted country. Surely they shall not be permitted to stand as onlookers while the self-sacrificing youth of America marches to the trenches. Either those aliens who are fit for military service must serve under the Stars and Stripes of their adopted home or they must leave our shores for some country in which they have a deeper interest.

I maintain that the command to these aliens to either "serve or leave" is not only a fundamental right of a sovereign nation but it is a most pressing American duty. This country has long been known as the melting pot of the world. Now is the time to see whether the melting pot has done its work. We have lighted underneath it the fires of patriotism, of noble ideals, and of American safety. Now, we want to know whether the metal of our peoples has been fused into the steel ingot of common purpose. In this bill we declare that the alien slacker, the elements that will not fuse into Americanism, shall be skimmed off and thrown on the slag heap.

It is repeated on this floor that to serve or leave is a bitter alternative. The process of melting is bound to be painful. Steel is not made by asking the ore if it wants to be melted. But the ore is needed for worthy service of mankind, and it is put into the melting pot so that good metal may be molded and the dross thrown away. So, too, with these aliens in our midst who come from our allies in war. They are tested as by fire, and in this moment of national need and national peril they must either fuse into the forces of Americanism or be cast out. The man who does not think enough of this country to defend it now has no right to live upon its soil.

We have heard much of our treaty with Italy. Let me read a statement sent out by Secretary Lansing in answer to a letter from the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. JAMES]. It is as follows:

Naturalization of an Italian subject in a foreign country without the consent of the Italian Government is no bar to liability to military service.

A former Italian subject may visit Italy without fear of molestation when he is under the age of 16 years, but between the ages of 16 and 39 he is liable to arrest and forced military service if he has not previously reported for such service. A former Italian subject who returns to Italy after the age of 39 is not liable for service. However, his exemption from punishment for past failure to appear is contingent upon his having complied with certain formalities which may be performed at an Italian embassy or consulate.

A petition for pardon of the offense of desertion or evasion of military service should be sent to the Italian Government directly, as this department does not act as the intermediary in presenting such a petition.

* * * * * * *

There is no naturalization treaty between the United States and Italy defining the rights of citizens or subjects of either country who may obtain naturalization in the other country. It may be stated, for your information, that in the absence of a naturalization treaty between the United States and Italy the Italian Government has taken the position that children born abroad to Italian subjects must be considered subjects of Italy and liable for the performance of military service in the army of that country.

Now, this attitude on the part of Italy simply means that that nation does not admit that former Italian citizens can be made full-fledged American citizens. There is the doctrine of dual nationality, and it shows that the Italian Government has no undue delicacy in its policy of dealing with those whom we regard as citizens of this country. To my mind the absence of a naturalization treaty with Italy at the present time is evidence that Italy will be the last country in the world to enter any protest to our undoubted right to deport undesirable aliens. I have a large number of former Italians in my district, and I want to say that they are loyal Americans and are with America in this war with all their hearts. At the very beginning of this war I received resolutions from a great mass meeting of former Italians held in my district, declaring earnest allegiance to the American cause and offering themselves for service in any way possible. I addressed a meeting on Washington's Birthday, last week, where some 14 different nationalities were represented. I went into the details of this "alien slacker" bill at length, and those present expressed their full approval of this measure. Those aliens who have appreciated the advantages of American citizenship and have taken out their papers of naturalization want that citizenship to mean something. They do not want unjust immunities and advantages to go to those who have never applied for citizenship.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] injected the remark a moment ago that the coal mines of Pennsylvania could not run if this measure is passed and carried out. I come from a district where many coal mines are operated, and I want to say that the number of aliens working in them will be lessened tremendously when it is emphatically understood that American citizenship means something and that remaining an alien does not assure unjust advantages over an American citizen. One of the main barriers to greater efficiency and production in the coal mines is that very thing, the absence of the feeling that citizenship means protection and rights as a member of the Nation over those who deliberately choose to remain outsiders. Let the word go out that aliens must either serve here or leave, that they shall not escape their obligations, and you will see renewed efforts in mine and mill and factory. You will see a more whole-hearted and eager response to the stern demand of to-day on the part of American citizens from every home affected by selective conscription.

Justice to Americans demands the passage of a measure to put value into American citizenship, to make it mean rights as well as obligations, and to make alien slackers either serve or get out of America. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state that he has noticed that some of the occupants of the galleries are indulging in applause. That is in violation of the rules of the House. The occupants of the gallery have no right as visitors in the gallery to express their approval or disapproval of what takes place on the floor, and the Chair hopes that occupants of the gallery will observe this rule. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON].

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GORDON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I just want to answer a few questions that have been propounded by the previous speakers.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] is a good lawyer and an able parliamentarian, but his whole contention here, his whole argument, is based upon the erroneous assumption of the legal liability of aliens to render military service in the country in which they are domiciled. Now, any lawyer that will stand upon the floor of the American Congress and make such a contention as that confesses his entire ignorance of international law and the rules and customs of this or any other nation, so far as diplomatic relations are concerned. What is the undisputed truth? During the Civil War we passed a conscription law similar to the one now in force, covering those who had declared their intentions. Secretary of State Seward, after the war was over, in a formal statement declared that in every single instance where an alien declarant was conscripted into the military service of the United States he was discharged if a demand was made by his government that he should be discharged. Unfortunately we embodied that same provision in our draft law. What is the result? The Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy is discharging these aliens on the request of their government. Of course he would discharge them. They are not legally liable to render military service.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course they could not make application to discharge themselves, and they have to apply through their own governments.

Mr. GORDON. They have to apply through their own governments. That is the unfairness and meanness of this legislation. It is taking advantage of the people that are in this household of ours at our invitation. In many instances we are lending enormous sums of money to their governments, which adds materially to the embarrassment of the situation. I do not like to say that we are attempting to take advantage of men who are here by our invitation, and because we are loaning money to their governments, because no alien can come into a country without consent of that country, and nobody can question but that we have given consent.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. In an effort to straighten out that situation, the Committee on Military Affairs has reported a bill to the House correcting it, based on the statement of the President himself.

Mr. GORDON. The Secretary of War and the Secretary of State have sent a bill down to the committee, and we have reported it out.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. We have not gotten through with one branch before we are forced to take up another bill in regard to the first-paper aliens.

Mr. GORDON. While you are deliberating here and talking about this the President of the United States, in order to avoid trouble with foreign nations, is simply ignoring the law you have already passed and dismissing these men from the military service because they are not legally liable to render it. And the one main point about this whole matter that every speaker insists upon ignoring for the purpose of pandering to the voters of his own district is that you have no legal authority to conscript an alien into the military service. Why should aliens fight for the American flag? Will somebody tell me?

Mr. BURNETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORDON. Yes.

Mr. BURNETT. If they are here and will not do it, why should our boys be sent over there and they be allowed to stay here?

Mr. GORDON. I will tell you why. Our men have got to fight the battles of our Nation. They are the only ones liable. The idea that an alien is under obligation to fight for a foreign flag is a mistake. That is a new discovery in international law. They are under no obligation to do it.

Mr. KEARNS. You have not answered the latter part of the gentleman's question. Why should they remain here?

Mr. GORDON. They should remain here, because, in the first place, if you deport these men across this submarine zone without a convoy at this time it means certain death. We can not furnish them with a convoy. It is a breach of faith on our part. They are here on our invitation. The most practical objection to this legislation, against its passage through the House—and it will never get further—and I want you to consider it, is that you will prostrate the industries of this country in all of the large cities, including the one in which I reside. Thirty-two thousand aliens between the ages of 21 and 30 in the city of Cleveland registered under our conscription law. We had a right to require them to register, because we had a right to identify them. We had a right to intern the alien enemies, and it might be necessary for you to do so for the protection of the country during the time of the war, because a state of war between two nations puts at war legally all the citizens of one nation with all the citizens and subjects of another nation. But just because we require them to register confers no right to impress them into military service. There is no such right. Every single authority on international law, regardless of treaties, holds you can not do that. If we were invaded suddenly, if there was a great insurrection, you perhaps might call upon aliens resident here to assist in suppressing it, but the idea that a sovereign nation can conscript an alien into its military service in order to fight a foreign war is a new discovery of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] in this debate.

There is no authority for it; none whatever. Our own State Department has thundered against it since the foundation of this Government, and, of course, the reason for it is perfectly obvious. If we insist upon the right to draft aliens into our military service we must concede the same right to foreign nations. And I do not care to be the citizen of a country that will permit its citizens to be drafted into the military service of foreign nations. James Madison, when Secretary of State, discussed this question fully and said that under no circumstances would it be permitted. The War of 1812 arose out of the actual impressment of American seamen into the British Navy more than from all the other causes combined. The assertion was made by the English that "once an Englishman, always an Englishman," and that their citizens could not throw off their allegiance to their mother country and become naturalized citizens of the United States. They did not assert the right then to draft native American citizens into their army or impress them into their navy. They simply claimed this right over men born in England who were naturalized under our laws. We denied their contention, and the War of 1812 was largely fought upon that question. James G. Blaine, in words that burned, denounced the proposition to draft an American citizen into the military service of a foreign country. Thomas F. Bayard did the same thing. It is not a party question. There is no authority anywhere on earth for the proposition that you have a right to compel an alien to enter the military service of a foreign nation in which he is domiciled.

Of course the President of the United States understands that. He is an authority upon history and upon international law. And what is he doing? What is he compelled and required to do? To ignore legislation that you have already enacted in order to keep the country out of war with other foreign nations who are challenging our right to draft their citizens and subjects into our military service, and a bill has been brought in here, at the request of the War Department and of the State Department and the President of the United States, to amend your draft law so as to exempt aliens coming from neutral countries from the provisions of that law. It is a constant source of irritation in connection with the drafting of our Army, although the President merely discharges them. But the unlawful laying of hands on them and subjecting them to the necessity of appealing to their Governments for protection under the rights they have under treaties and international law is a source of great embarrassment.

We have a pretty good-sized war on our hands now. I do not think we should needlessly attempt to take on another. We have denounced the enemy of the United States in this war because he has violated the rights of our citizens under international law and has violated treaties we had with him, but that is exactly what we are attempting to do here by this sort of legislation. Gentlemen, it is a mere pandering to the same sentiment which in the days of President John Adams led to the enactment of the alien laws and which aided to bring about the destruction of the old Federal Party; and I want you to remember that the time will come when some of you will regret this. Of course just now, in time of war, the aliens are a very unpopular proposition in the United States. The alien has no vote in most of the States. In nine of them, I will say to you, he may vote by declaring his intention. That is a situation which ought to be changed by constitutional amendment at once. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Chairman, at last it appears that Congress is to remedy a condition regarding alien slackers. This problem has caused a great deal of trouble and dissatisfaction in many of the draft districts where there are a large number of aliens registered. The bill now before Congress provides for the deportation of certain aliens who want to escape military service, and for other purposes. I hope the bill will pass, and I believe it ought to pass.

One of the principal objects of the bill is to prohibit aliens who are natives or subjects of countries who are at war with Germany or with any of the other central countries of Europe from ever becoming American citizens when they claim or hereafter claim exemption from the selective draft, and further it requires the deportation of such aliens as soon as it is practicable to do so. We understand and appreciate that it is impossible at the present time to deport many of these aliens on account of the impracticability of securing immediately ships and other means of deportation, but under this bill it will be done as soon as these means are available.

I am in favor of the passage of this bill without the amendment by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS], which is as follows: Insert the following after the word "citizens," page 2, line 4:

Provided, That this act shall not be construed to supersede the provisions of any existing treaty with such country the terms of which stipulate that the United States shall not subject the subjects of such country to compulsory military service.

I do not believe that such an amendment is necessary in view of the statement by the chairman of the Comimttee on Foreign Affairs regarding existing treaties between this country and some of our cobelligerents, particularly Italy, and further because of a letter received by him yesterday which reads as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington, February 25, 1918.

MY DEAR MR. FLOOD: Referring to the negotiations which the department is carrying on with certain of our cobelligerents regarding military service conventions, I desire to state for your information that on Tuesday last I signed with the British representative two conventions, one for Great Britain and one for Canada, and that I am now in receipt of telegrams from the American ambassadors at Rome and Paris practically accepting with a few minor changes the proposal of the United States to enter into similar conventions with Italy and France. I am not expecting that any serious obstacle will be placed in the way of early signature to these conventions.

Very sincerely, yours,

ROBERT LANSING.

Hon. HENRY D. FLOOD,
House of Representatives.

In view of all this I had supposed that the opposition of our cobelligerents had been removed until our friend from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] took the floor. He is very much concerned about the industries that are going to stop because these aliens are likely to be deported if the law passes, as I hope it will. What about the industries in a district such as I represent, where perhaps all of the natives between the ages of 21 and 31 will be compelled to render military service under the selective-draft law as it exists. He tells us that these foreigners are here by our invitation, whereas everybody who has served in this House for any length of time knows that for the last 10 years there has been an effort on the part of Congress, much to my regret, to deny immigrants admission to this country. I have always been and am still in favor of liberal immigration.

Now, let me give you an illustration of conditions as I find them. I represent a district in the very center of the city of Chicago, composed largely of foreigners and the children of foreigners. The great majority are patriotic citizens, with many more anxious to become citizens. Quite a large number are aliens. In my own draft district nearly 60 per cent of those registered of draft age are aliens. Now, you have to get the quota for that district from the 40 per cent of natives or those naturalized and those with first papers. Quite a percentage of those selected have taken out only their first papers. In such a district, or in any like district, nearly all the natives will be drafted to make up the quota for the district. Is that fair? I do not believe you think so.

I had a telegram shortly after the selective-draft law went into force from the local exemption board of the district in which I reside saying that the conditions were such that they would not serve there. Let me read you their telegram:

CHICAGO, ILL., July 22, 1917.

Hon. THOMAS GALLAGHER, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.:

We desire to call your attention to the fact that in the forty-second division, comprising the first, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth, twenty-fifth, twenty-sixth, twenty-seventh, and twenty-eighth precincts of the nineteenth ward; there is a total registration of 3,768; of this number there are 2,242 aliens, constituting 59.5 per cent of the total registration, leaving 1,526 citizens to draw from. If quota to be furnished is based upon the total number registered it will be impossible to comply with same. The unfairness of such a request is apparent in due justice to our fellow citizens of this district. The quota should be based upon the number of citizens registered and not upon the total registration unless quota to be furnished is based as suggested above. We, the undersigned members of local exemption board No. 42, of the city of Chicago, county of Cook, State of Illinois, do hereby and herewith tender our resignation, to take effect immediately.

RAOUL R. HAAS, M. D., Chairman.
WALTER ARNOLD AMBERG, L. L. Bh., Clerk.

I took the matter up with Gen. Crowder, and he said they will have to serve, they can not resign. I wired them back to that effect and told them they must serve to avoid trouble.

Congress did not know of such a condition as this when the selective-draft law was passed, and I have told the people of the district on several occasions that Congress would remedy the condition, and this bill, if enacted into a law, is a remedy.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GALLAGHER. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARDY. Can the gentleman tell us what proportion of the aliens in his district are either alien enemies or alien neutrals?

Mr. GALLAGHER. A large proportion, in the particular district of which I speak, are Italians. The native boy of Italian parents or the boy whose father became a naturalized citizen is as anxious to fight for the Stars and Stripes as any in the country. We also have quite a large number of Greeks there, and as near as I can learn the percentage of exemptions almost equals the number of aliens in this and like districts.

Mr. HARDY. Are there no Germans or Austrians?

Mr. GALLAGHER. Very few; they are scattered.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GALLAGHER. With pleasure.

Mr. FESS. Are there not a great many Slovaks and Slovenes and Czech that are very loyal but who would stand under our law as alien enemies?

Mr. GALLAGHER. Yes; and a great many of them are offering to serve and are willing to serve.

Mr. FESS. That situation ought to be cured.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Take the Poles, for instance. Perhaps the largest colony of Poles in this country are in my district, and they have national headquarters there for many of their organizations and associations. There are no people in this country that are as anxious for us to succeed in this war as are the Poles, and none more loyal, either.

Mr. FESS. Yet they are technically alien enemies?

Mr. GALLAGHER. Yes; they are technically alien enemies.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GALLAGHER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BARNHART. These loyal so-called alien enemies have a perfect right to enlist.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Yes; and the Poles and Italians are enlisting in large numbers. Many, very many who are out of the draft age. It is the fellow who is taking advantage of our exemption laws and is trying to stay here and take the job of the boy who is drafted that this bill will regulate. These are the ones we are after.

Mr. FESS. Suppose they were taken prisoners at the front when enrolled in our service. What would happen to them?

Mr. GALLAGHER. They would have a bad time of it, I expect, if captured by Germany.

Mr. GORDON. They would be executed for treason.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Well, they are willing and anxious to take the chance. I do hope that this Congress will remedy the condition I complain of and such as I have described.

If, as President Wilson says, we are fighting "for the rights of small nations, for freedom in the world, for justice and for peace," then, in my opinion, it is the duty of all who love liberty to fight for these principles.

I believe it to be the duty of all men who have come to this country to better their conditions and share with us the blessings of a free government, and especially those who come from a country which is now at war with Germany, to fight with us under our flag, where they will receive adequate pay for their services, compared with that which they would receive in the service of the country from which they came, and where they will receive also the pension or insurance that our law provides and which our boys will receive. If they will not fight under these conditions, they should be made to go back home and fight, and I feel almost certain that the treaties that are now in the making will provide that they be drafted in the service of the country from which they came, if they do not enter our military service. I am simply expressing the indignation of my constituents about the injustice of the condition that I have described in my draft district and which exists to a certain extent throughout the whole congressional district. They do not believe it is fair to fight the battle of liberty, justice, and right for men who will not fight for themselves.

I hope this bill will pass, and pass without the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, because according to the statement made by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs there is no necessity for that amendment in this bill. It is a proper law, and we ought to pass it, as suggested by the chairman of the committee reporting it. [Applause.]

Mr. HARDY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have an agreement about the time of debate. Will the gentleman from Texas yield for that purpose?

Mr. HARDY. I will.

Mr. BURNETT. I would like to have 15 minutes agreed upon for debate. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER] is a member of the committee, and I should expect to yield to him. I think this is all there is to it. None of this debate is germane to the amendment I have offered, but I have not objected to it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. But it is very illuminating. I am sure the gentleman is inclined to be liberal. There will be no attempt to consume the time unnecessarily.

Mr. BURNETT. Twenty-five minutes, then, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. We should have 15 minutes on this side.

Mr. BURNETT. Thirty minutes, and the gentleman may control 15 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Let it be controlled by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. BURNETT. Will you allow the gentleman from New York to come in under your time?

Mr. STAFFORD. We have already requests for 15 minutes on this side.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the request?

Mr. STAFFORD. Make it 18 minutes.

Mr. BURNETT. I will make it 20 minutes on a side, and ask that it be upon the entire section and all amendments thereto. There is no amendment pending except the one that I have offered.

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty minutes on a side?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And who is to control the time?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. For this side, let the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] control it.

Mr. BURNETT. Twenty minutes to be controlled by myself and 20 minutes by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto be concluded at the end of 40 minutes, half the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] and half the time by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama desire to use his time now?

Mr. BURNETT. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] has been recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] had five minutes before the agreement was made?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] has an amendment to make this section conform to the amendment that was made to the first section, and I would ask that he be allowed his five minutes without it being taken out of the 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to that request?

Mr. RAKER. Reserving the right to object, I ask that I have five minutes in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think that would be eminently unfair. The other side would then have 35 minutes to 20 minutes on this side. We are not objecting to the arrangement to allow the gentleman from Alabama to have an additional five minutes, but everybody will be asking five minutes.

Mr. RAKER. Everybody is not going to ask five minutes. I am a member of the committee and I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama. I do not believe the amendment ought to go on to the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. They will have more time on that side, then.

Mr. BURNETT. Upon that question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is any further time asked?

Mr. BURNETT. I ask that there be 25 minutes on each side.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama now asks unanimous consent that there be 25 minutes on each side—the time on one side to be controlled by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] and on the other side by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], and this does not include the five minutes already granted to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY]. Is there objection?

Mr. RAKER. Reserving the right to object, does that include five minutes to the "gentleman from California"?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair knows nothing about that. The time has been extended five minutes on a side.

Mr. RAKER. The chairman of the committee agrees to yield to me five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] is recognized for five minutes, not to be taken out of the time agreed upon.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I want to address myself to the Rogers amendment. There have been clearly expressed two views as to the operation of the bill before the House without that amendment. One opinion is that it will not violate any treaty of ours with any other nation. Another view is that it does clearly violate our treaty with Italy and perhaps other countries. I will not undertake to discuss which one of those views is right as a legal proposition, although in my judgment it does clearly violate our treaty; but I will say this, that if it does not violate a treaty the Rogers amendment does no harm. If it does violate a treaty, then the Rogers amendment is very essential if we wish as a nation to preserve good faith. Now, let me say what the Rogers amendment is. In substance it simply provides that if this bill in any particular does violate any treaty, it shall be so far inoperative and void. We as a Nation have contended that the highest international obligation is good faith, and we have denounced the German Imperial Government because it tore up a treaty as a scrap of paper. Yet forsooth, because the present conditions may not be to our fancy, and many aliens in our midst have not volunteered for our Army, we propose to refuse to attach to this bill a provision that it shall be inoperative if it violates a treaty, which by its express terms agreed that we would not force or compel the citizens of another country to serve in our Army. Let me make this statement, further, that good faith does not depend upon legal obligations. Good faith is a moral question, and if this law violates the moral obligation of the treaties we have entered into, or the moral obligations of international law, which we profess to adhere to, we ought not to pass it. There is not only our obligation of good faith to nations, but under our laws the aliens from all climes and countries who meet the conditions of our immigration laws have been invited to settle among us and locate here and build up their homes and their fortunes here. The very terms of our law are an invitation to them to come and obey our law and live with us under the well-understood obligation on our part that we would not force them to serve in our Armies. These men from other countries have come. They are here with us, and now we propose to say that "We have the legal right, notwithstanding our treaty, to deport you if you do not volunteer, and we will hold over you the threat of deportation.

These gentlemen who say there is no violation of the treaty forget that you may morally break a treaty though you keep it to the letter. They forget that you can compel a man to do a thing by duress as well as by taking him by the nape of the neck; and when a man has his all here, you as much compel him to join your Army when you tell him that you will deport him and confiscate his property as if you had conscripted him.

You may salve your conscience and say that he is not serving by compulsion—because you leave him the choice of volunteering or being deported—but you would quickly take the other side of that question if one of our citizens rightfully in a foreign country, which had agreed with us not to compel our citizens to enter her army, were to be given the same choice. Then there is one other subject I want to call attention to. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] argues that this bill will do away with the foreigners getting the jobs of the Americans. You recognize that you can not apply this law to the neutral or to the enemy alien. Now, I would like to know what percentage of aliens in our midst belong to Italy, France, or England. Why, the German will go scot free under this law and so will every Austrian who is living here, as well as all neutral nationals.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And where do the Finnish people come in?

Mr. HARDY. I do not know; but every Russian, I think, to-day would be exempt from this law, and only a minor per cent of the aliens would be affected by it. Surely, when the administration tells us that they have about completed negotiations with France, England, and Italy for an amendment of our treaties with them, and when the administration evidently does not want this law passed, we ought not to pass it without the amendment. From every standpoint the Rogers amendment ought to be incorporated into the bill, and then we could hold our skirts so clear from the stigma of violation of our national faith that no man could shake his finger at us and say, "Thou, too, art the guilty man." [Applause.]

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I ask that my amendment be read for the information of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, lines 5 and 6, strike out the words "or with any of the central powers of Europe" and insert in lieu thereof "Austria-Hungary, Bulgaria, and Turkey."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, when this amendment, in identical language, was offered to section 1 at the time we had the bill up for consideration on the 6th of the month, it seemed to have caused some misapprehension in regard to the purpose for which it was offered. The only purpose I had in view was to clarify and make definite the real purpose of the language of the act.

Mr. ROBBINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. Is there any declaration of war against Turkey? Why should we include that country?

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is what I want to make clear, as to what the committee intended. I am not wedded to the amendment, but I think in justice to the bill it ought to be made clear, so that there will be no misunderstanding. The words "central powers" only refer to the geographical location. It is not in capital letters, so as to give it political significance. It ought at least to be capitalized, so that we will understand what autonomy is intended and what specific countries it refers to. The bill as it stands here says:

That after 30 days from the passage of this act no alien who is a native or subject of any country that is engaged in the war with Germany, or with any of the central powers of Europe—

What are referred to here as the central powers of Europe? Is it Germany and Austria-Hungary, or is it to be taken in its broader acceptation of the term and include Bulgaria and Turkey? I asked a distinguished scholar of the House when the matter was called to my attention what he understood to be meant by "central powers," and he said Germany and Austria-Hungary. I said what classification would you put Bulgaria and Turkey into, and he said they were Balkan powers and, according to the strict political construction, are not included in the words "central powers." My only purpose was to make clear and specific the intention of the committee as to this part of the bill. If we intend to include all the four powers, we ought to so declare it, or at least have the words "central powers" capitalized. I offered it to the first section of the bill. I had no purpose in offering the amendment except to make specific the intention of the committee. I think it is of sufficient importance to clarify it by this amendment. I will ask the chairman of the committee what was the purpose of the committee in using the words "central powers"?

Mr. BURNETT. The committee thought it was all these powers that were at war against the allied powers; that they should be regarded as the central powers.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In other words, Germany, Austria-Hungary, Bulgaria, and Turkey?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If that was the intention and purpose of the bill, it ought to be set out in that language. I want to submit it to the judgment of the House and call attention to it. I think the amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. BURNETT. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, this same proposed amendment was offered when the bill was up before to lines 5 and 6, section 1. The only objection is that it is not exactly what the committee wants, but what the bill intends. We do not want to designate those that are not at war with the United States or those we have not declared war against. The gentleman from Alabama has clearly covered the matter. I imagine the committee would have no objection to capitalizing the words "central powers." It seems to be more in harmony with the bill than it would to distinguish by putting in Germany and Austria that we have declared war against and then in addition putting in Bulgaria and Turkey, two countries that we have not declared war against

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If you will read the text, it does not relate wholly to countries that we have declared war against, but to those countries with which ourselves and allies are at war.

Mr. RAKER. As we understood, and it has been so presented by all of the parties, we are not an ally with any country, and therefore that may be an unhappy expression in the bill. I do not believe anything in this bill says we are the ally of any of these countries.

Mr. FESS. We do not use the word "ally" in the bill, but in the explanation we are trying to cover those citizens of the countries that are at war with the central powers. Now, who are the central powers?

Mr. RAKER. Let us be frank, and let us legislate upon matters as they exist.

Mr. FESS. Here is the point. Some of those powers are at war against Germany and Austria, and not against Bulgaria and Turkey.

Mr. RAKER. That is true, and why not let us meet the thing face to face and legislate upon the matter and against the countries we have declared war against?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then you would exclude a lot of aliens?

Mr. RAKER. I mean the countries that we have declared war against. Why pick out the countries that England and France and Italy have declared war against?

Mr. FESS. That is not the purpose of the committee.

Mr. RAKER. No. Then why complicate the bill by naming Bulgaria and Turkey, because we as a Nation have not declared war against those countries, while England and France have declared war against those two countries. All of the central powers——

Mr. FESS. What does the gentleman include in that?

Mr. RAKER. It is my view of the matter that includes Germany and Austria-Hungary.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is the very confusion I was seeking to clear up.

Mr. ROMJUE. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman is quite right in that, and it is immaterial whether it includes Austria and Germany alone or all the powers. Certainly, Austria and Germany are the central powers, and there is no nation in this war as our ally but what has declared war on Germany and Austria. Of course, there is an exception in the Balkan States.

Mr. RAKER. Yes; and I do not believe that we ought to complicate it, although the gentleman's suggestion that we capitalize the words "central powers" could do no harm, but why include in this bill a specific designation as to Bulgaria and Turkey when the bill clearly specifies what we want and what we are intending to accomplish and will bring about, as I believe, the relief that is sufficient to take these aliens who are here and will not join our own forces abroad. This, of course, is not vital in any way. It can do no harm, though the bill as reported by the committee is plain. The thing we want is this proposed legislation enacted into law and placed on the statute books. It will relieve the present embarrassing situation. The American people are firmly convinced that this legislation should be enacted and enforced. Those who are receiving the benefits of our Nation should be willing to assist in our present troubles. If not, they should not become citizens of America, but should be sent home where they belong. It is entirely optional with them. But when they decline to assist us, then we know they never would make proper citizens of this country, and so state in this bill, and in addition we assist in getting rid of their presence, which is harmful to the Nation. We treat all just and fair. We want like treatment in turn. From all angles I feel myself much impressed with the objects and purposes of the bill. As a member of the committee having consideration and charge of this bill I voted to report it to the House and shall continue to assist all I can in securing its final passage by the House.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to call your attention to a condition which existed in the city in which I live during the first draft. When they called for the registrations there were 25,000 young men between the ages of 21 and 31 who registered. Ten thousand of those registrants were aliens, not subject to serve with the United States Government at all. By reason of the registration of these 10,000 aliens this city was compelled to furnish almost twice as many young Americans as it would have had to furnish if those 10,000 aliens had not registered. I claim that is unfair. I want to see something done. I either want to see the means of raising the draft quota changed or else I am going to support this bill. I do not believe that it is fair to compel the young Americans to go to the war while these men stay at home and take their places in the great industries and shops in the district which I represent. I listened to the speech of my friend, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON], and I believe it was one of the very best speeches I have ever heard him make, up until the last sentence, and then what did he say? He said, "Some of you men are going to be sorry; the day will come when you will regret voting for this bill." He said a great many of the aliens are not voters now, but they will be some day, thereby intimating that if we dared to vote for this measure we would suffer, as far as these votes are concerned, when the election time rolled around.

Mr. GORDON. Oh, Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? He is entirely mistaken.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I yield if I am mistaken.

Mr. GORDON. Certainly. I had no reference to any election in my mind. These men are not voters.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Did the gentleman not say that some men would live to regret this day?

Mr. GORDON. Yes; when this war is over and this feeling against aliens has all died out, then gentlemen will see the wrong in it. You are seeking to impose an obligation that these men are exempt from under the law of nations.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Why does the gentleman say that these men were not voters now, but soon will be? What do you mean?

Mr. GORDON. I said a lot of gentlemen were supporting this thing because these aliens had no power to assert their rights, because they are not voters. That is what I meant.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I want to say to my friend from Cleveland, and I like him, that I come from a district that has probably as many aliens in it as his own district, but that as far as I am concerned I care not what my political future may be, I am going to stand here and do what little I can to protect the American boys and make these men do their part. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, we all feel proud of the brave young Americans who have answered the call of our country and stand ready to give their life's blood for the great cause which we are contending and fighting for to-day. These young men have been selected from the finest blood in our land; they are the pick of our young American manhood, and as they leave to fight our battles in a foreign land we realize that many of them will never return again; and, Mr. Chairman, realizing this as I do, I feel that there is no too great a sacrifice for me to make in order to help these young men in the great, noble, patriotic service which they are performing to-day. [Applause.]

The district which I have the honor to represent in this Congress has furnished about 5,000 young men, who have answered the call of our President to follow the Stars and Stripes into a foreign land. I honor and respect these boys, and for that reason I am going to vote for this bill. It is a matter of principle and justice to me, for it is not fair and right to draft our American boys to fight the battle of our country and at the same time allow thousands of able-bodied young aliens who are subjects of the countries that are now at war with Germany and who intend to make this their home for all time enjoying the privileges of our country and taking the place of our young men who are going to a foreign land to fight their battle. I shall vote for this bill as a matter of justice and fair play to our brave boys who are now fighting, shedding their blood in the trenches on the blood-soaked battle fields of France. [Applause.]

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER].

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, I think, in the consideration of the bill there are two or three matters that we should keep very clearly in mind as regards not only our right but the wisdom of taking some action of this nature. In the first place, it will help us all the time if we remember that when it comes down to the real fact of the case that we have declared war against Germany and Austria because of what they did to our citizens and because of their attempt to destroy our Nation, and that we would be compelled to fight them and would fight them if nobody else was in the war. To that extent it is our war, so far as we are concerned. In the second place, we certainly, as a Government, have a right to say to men who are within our Government who are not citizens whether they shall remain during such times as this or not. Now, all we say in this bill is this. "We are getting ready to deport men who are not citizens of the United States and send them back to their own countries until this war is over unless those men see fit to join with us in this war." It is not the same thing as saying to a man, "You must serve or go to prison." It is saying to everybody, in giving notice, "You can prepare to pack your trunk until the trouble is over in the family unless you want to help us save the house."

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. MEEKER. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Could an American complain if a foreign country said to the American resident of that country, "You will either fight with us or go home"?

Mr. MEEKER. I wish they would say it. [Applause.] I wish the foreign countries would say to our men who are there, "You are encumbering the earth. Now, you must pack your bag and return home until our trouble is over, unless you want to help us."

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Suppose the Mexican Government did that?

Mr. MEEKER. To our people?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Then what?

Mr. MEEKER. If Mexico stated, so far as the protection of the rights of our people are concerned down there, we are protecting the right of any alien here, certainly Mexico has the right to say to anyone in Mexico at the present time, or any other Government would have, if they did not desire the presence of certain citizens there, that they must go. If we can not say that, then the alien has a greater right in America than we have ourselves. Who is running this Government, aliens?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEEKER. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Does the gentleman believe there is any red-blooded young American in any foreign country to-day but what has offered his services?

Mr. MEEKER. No "red blooded"; the gentleman put in the words "red blooded" with his question, but there are some Americans who have a yellow streak; but when the gentleman says "red blooded," of course not. But now I think we should divest this whole argument of all the question of our associations in the war and simply serve notice on the men in the United States who are here from other countries that we are going to issue a general order of deportation, and these gentlemen will be given the privilege and the opportunity of deciding for themselves whether they want to stay and assist in this program, and if they do not care so to do why should not they go? That is the one question, why should not they go if they are not willing to fight here. It is none of our business whether they are put in the army of their own nations when they get back. It is very evident many of them are not going back, because they know they will be put in the service there, and the way the situation is now they can not be put into service here and their own country can not take them back. They are the "fortunate" men of the struggle who have gone beyond the reach of their own nation and yet are insisting we can not touch them because they are aliens. Now, we simply issue a general order for all aliens of military age to go in 60 days. We do that for the protection and welfare of our own Nation. If the alien comes and says, "I prefer to fight; I want to join your military forces," very well, then. If they want to join our military forces, well enough. If they want to join our military forces, we will accept them in the Army. When this becomes a law, it will no longer leave a twilight zone for the alien slacker who will not fight in our Army because he happens to be here and stands on a technical treaty right. [Applause.] Now, then, we are violating no treaty any more than when we put a city under martial law in a time of great fire or danger. We say to the party, no difference whether he is an alien or who he is, "If you will not help us to fight this fire, we will throw you in the fire," and he ought to be thrown in. That is the one point of this bill. We are violating no treaty; we are standing on our rights, serving notice we will empty this country of aliens within 30 days for the good of the country unless those men want to fight with us. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I want to see in good faith what I understand the situation. As I understand it, all the people of draftable or conscriptive age in the United States have been registered. I think that is so, is it not?

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Whether they are citizens of the United States, Germany, Italy, Bulgaria, or any other country. Now, then, as I understand it, we have a treaty, made in time of peace with the principal nations with whom we are at war, that they shall not, notwithstanding the war, force our citizens who may be in such country into their army and we shall not force their citizens into our Army. Is that right?

Mr. GORDON. That is correct.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman says it is correct. Now, then, I want to understand further. It was stated, whether true or not, that our ally, Italy, refuses to recognize the naturalization of Italian citizens in this country between a certain age, and the gentleman stated the maximum age to be 39 and the minimum age I do not recall—probably 18 or 20, whichever it was. Am I right about that?

The gentleman says it is correct. Now, I understand further, and without information, that there are a great many citizens of countries with which we are at war, and citizens of neutral countries and citizens of our allied countries, in the United States and not naturalized. Now, in that condition it seems to me the trouble as to the slackers comes about very largely from the fact that the Congress of the United States when it passed the law for conscription did not provide for the condition. And in many of our districts there are people in the coal mines, perhaps, and in the munition factories, and upon the railroads that have been registered but exempted on the ground of noncitizenship in the United States. I understand there are some cases, and it has been admitted, where the Italians have gone into our service voluntarily and are subject to be taken as Italian subjects. Whether Italy would take them or not, being an ally, I do not know. Now, it seems to me we can not say that all of these people who under treaties with foreign governments not American citizens shall get out in 60 days. Well, they can not get out. Some of them might, here and there, but we will have great trouble in convoying our soldiers to the other side and shipping munitions and food products to them and to our allies in Europe on account of our insufficient shipping. The dissatisfaction with the present condition arises from the failure of Congress to enact proper legislation when we enacted the draft law under which we enrolled all our population, United States citizens and those who are not citizens, between the age of 21 and 31, and the noncitizens are exempted where drafted, throwing on the citizens the burden of furnishing the quota for themselves and also for the noncitizens. [Applause.] The noncitizens were not evenly distributed among the citizens in the various localities throughout the country.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York, my colleague on the committee [Mr. SIEGEL].

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] was greatly in error when he stated here a few moments ago that the bill that has been offered by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. DENT] applied to any alien of any of the countries that are engaged in the war with Germany. That bill applies only to neutrals, and the present bill which——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It applies to first-paper neutrals. It applies to declarants of neutral countries in the United States who have, as a result of being first-paper men, been taken into the Army.

Mr. SIEGEL. The countries that are not at war with Germany.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. SIEGEL. And the bill we now have under consideration expressly and exclusively applies to all of those aliens who are natives or subjects of a country engaged in the war with Germany. And therefore both measures are not in contradiction with each other. The Dent measure applies to men who have come here from countries that are still neutral and not fighting Germany, and this measure applies to those men who are in the United States from such countries as are fighting Germany.

Now, the situation that confronts the average man from a city district, particularly New York, or in any other large city, is this: Take my congressional district, for example, or take the congressional district that is represented by my worthy colleague, Mr. LAGUARDIA, who is now in Italy and is doing his bit over there, fighting for America. [Applause.] In Mr. LAGUARDIA's district about 40 per cent of the men are aliens between the ages of 21 and 31. In my district the percentage is 42 or 43. What has been the result? We have found that in those districts the boy who was born here or the boy whose father became naturalized was taken at the ratio of 1 out of 6, while in other States, particularly the Southern States, only 1 out of 10 was selected, caused by the fact that the native born is greater in numbers and that the percentage of aliens is very small. And then we have another condition of affairs. We have men who came here 20 or 25 years ago, and brought along with them children, did not become citizens. And that applies a good deal to our friends from Great Britain and several of the other belligerent countries. They did not become citizens, with the consequence that their children are aliens to-day, so far as this country is concerned, and they neither enlist in our forces or go abroad to fight for Great Britain. And I feel that either a man coming from a country which is at war with Germany should fight under our flag, the same as our boys are doing, or he should go abroad and fight there. [Applause.] We can not go to work to make a selected class of those who will not become citizens of our own country, and who, when our own boys are going to war, sit idly by in the same block, in the same tenements, or on the same street and laugh at or ridicule the boy whose father became a citizen when he came here years ago.

Now, there has been some discussion here as to whether aliens have voluntarily enlisted, and I say, as far as the forces are concerned, that we have at the present time 76,000 men who are in the military forces of the country to-day. In times of war aliens can and have enlisted. Those 76,000 men are of the high type of aliens that you and I desire to have in this country. I know of no man here in the House who has stood for more liberal immigration than I have. I stand for that kind of liberal immigration which is represented by our colleague, Representative LAGUARDIA, who is of Italian descent [applause], and when our Republic is in danger goes forward and fights. I do not stand for that kind of immigration which desires to have our protection and then refuses to fight for the country which has given them liberty, justice, a fair deal, and the same opportunity that all have here. [Applause.] We have the same benefits, and we should give the same service. I know that practically all immigrants and their children feel the same way, and are even now making every sacrifice that we require. It is because there are some with different ideas that the question is before us. The proper spirit is shown in the following from the New York Times of Sunday, February 24, 1918:

THE PARADE OF THE DRAFTED MEN.

On Washington's Birthday, in a snowstorm, 10,000 New York City men of the National Army marched down Fifth Avenue.

The marching men, the fighting men,
Glorious youth to the fore again!
A nation's hopes in the rolling beat
Of the drums and the tramp of marching feet;
A nation's heart with the men who go
In quest of a dream through the whirling snow.

Glorious youth to the fore again!
Courage battling with death, as when
Washington faced in a fateful hour
The doom pronounced by a haughty power.
On they go, on they go,
In quest of a dream through the whirling snow.

The marching men, the fighting men,
The soul of Lincoln alive again,
Alive in the sleet of the buffeting North,
Spurring the dark-skinned legions forth,
Shackled no longer, to rise and go
In quest of a dream through the whirling snow.

Glorious youth to the fore again
In the march of the Nation's fighting men!
Erin's host, Judea's sons,
Gaul and Slav with shouldered guns,
Welded in purpose bravely go
In quest of a dream through the whirling snow.

Men of America! Is it a dream—
The peace of the world and the fireside gleam?
A world from the Teuton curse released?
A world set free from the scourge of the beast?
Merely a dream as on ye go,
Tramp, tramp, tramp through the whirling snow?

Men of America! East and West,
North and South, have given their best
To mold as one a will of steel
That shall make the dream we fight for real!
Soldiers of justice, on ye go
For humanity's dream in the whirling snow!

(Elias Lieberman.)

[Applause.]

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, how much time have we on this side?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama has 5 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Wisconsin has 17 minutes.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the same request. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I also ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio makes the same request. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I have already expressed myself as being in favor of the Burnett bill. It seems to me that we have delayed its passage long enough. I hope before the afternoon is over the final vote may be taken upon it.

I wish to use the short space of time allotted to me in calling the attention of the committee to some interesting statistics which came to my attention yesterday in reference to the amount of war-risk insurance that has been taken out by soldiers and sailors. I happened to call at the office of Commissioner Nesbitt yesterday and was given these figures, which seem to me to be extremely interesting.

The total mail received by the bureau on February 25 was 11,291 letters. There was in force on that date $10,229,685,000 of insurance. There was in force last night—I called up this morning to see what the addition was overnight, or within 24 hours—and there was in force to-day $10,400,313,500. The number of applications, including day before yesterday, was 1,262,447. Last night it was 1,284,665, showing the receipt yesterday of over 22,000 applications. The average amount of these policies day before yesterday was $8,103. Yesterday the average was $8,096. The highest number of applications received in any one day was 54,000. The highest amount written in any one day was $501,622, or an average of $9,289, showing how nearly all the men applying for insurance were taking their full allotment of $10,000. In addition to the insurance there have been filed 1,327,342 applications for allotments and allowances. There have been 518,282 awards sent to the disbursing officer, of which 19,101 were sent day before yesterday. The number of employees in the department yesterday was 2,383, and in addition to that there are about 400 employed during the evening by the hour.

It seems to me that these statistics of the value of the war-risk insurance to the men in the service are well worth the House having a knowledge of. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. JAMES].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, at the outset I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, it is true that we welcome aliens here to avoid oppression.

I do not believe that the fathers of the Constitution ever intended that we should offer any "harbor of refuge" to people who refuse to fight for the land that befriended them when they needed a friend.

It was never intended that our native born should do all the fighting and the alien slacker go "scot free."

We know what is in this alien-slacker bill; we do not know what is in the proposed treaties.

Those of us who favor this bill want our boys to do part of the easy work here at home and part of the fighting abroad, whereas men of the same views as those expressed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] would have the alien slacker stay here and do all the easy work and hold down all the light jobs while our boys do all the fighting.

There has been a good deal of talk here about the Italians. I have thousands of them in my district, and few of them are slackers. They want to fight for this country and not for Italy.

I have been in correspondence with Hon. Robert Lansing, Secretary of State, for over two years in regard to the status of Italians and their sons.

According to our treaty with Italy a man who takes out his first and second papers is still regarded as a subject of Italy, according to the Italian law; and when these Italians were ordered to go back, although they were American citizens, they refused to go; but they want to fight for this country.

If a man were born here of Italian parents, even though he were a Member of Congress, and should go back to Italy he could be compelled to fight in the Italian Army; and, according to the statements of our Secretary of State, we could do nothing in such a case. I understand, however, from a letter received from him to-day that he intends to take care of those who have taken out their first and second papers and also those who are of American birth, and yet who, as I have said, according to our treaty with Italy, can be compelled to serve in the Italian Army.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JAMES. Yes.

Mr. FLOOD. I think the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. JAMES. At present such an American-born boy is not recognized as an American in any treaty with Italy. If he was a man born here of Italian parents—although a Member of Congress, as I say—if he got to Italy he could be compelled to fight in the Italian Army.

Mr. FLOOD. But that is in accordance with the Italian law.

Mr. JAMES. Yes. The Italian Government does not recognize our citizenship.

On January 10, 1916, I wrote the Secretary of State, in part, as follows:

MY DEAR SIR: Among my constituents are several thousand people of Italian birth. Many of them are American citizens and hundreds more have taken out their second papers. Many of them have been asked to come back to Italy and fight under the Italian flag. Very few have gone because they consider themselves American citizens. Seeing that they have not responded to the call to arms, they are afraid in case they went back to Italy they would be tried for desertion. * * * They have asked me to write you and see what their standing would be in case they went back for a visit. * * *.

Yours, respectfully,

W. FRANK JAMES.

Under date of January 13 Mr. Lansing replied and sent me a copy of a circular entitled "Liability for military service in Italy of Italians in this country who have obtained or intend to obtain naturalization."

One statement in this circular reads in part:

Italian subjects are liable for service in the army between the ages of 18 and 39. * * * Naturalization of an Italian subject in a foreign country without consent of the Italian Government is no bar to military service. * * * A former Italian subject may visit Italy without fear of molestation when he is under the age of 16 years, but between the ages of 16 and 39 he is liable to arrest and forced military service if he has not previously reported for such service. * * * There is no treaty between the United States and Italy defining the status of former Italian subjects who have become American citizens.

Have several other letters regarding the matter, and when we declared war against Austria took the matter up again and called attention to the fact that it was even more important then, as it was likely that we would send some of these Italian born to Italy to fight for us against Austria, and they wanted to be positive that they could not be arrested for refusal to come back to fight for Italy when called several years ago.

Under date of December 14 Mr. Lansing stated that the matter would be taken up with the War Department and would then write me again.

Several days ago I received the following letter from Mr. Lansing, which indicates that our Government expects to take care of these Americans of Italian birth:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, February 21, 1918.

MY DEAR MR. JAMES: I have received your letter of February 16 inquiring further with regard to the status of Italian subjects in the United States, former Italian subjects who have become American citizens, and native American citizens of Italian parentage, who may enlist or be drafted in the United States Army and subsequently be sent to Italy. As I informed you in my letter of December 14, it was considered necessary in the first instance to obtain the views of the War Department on this matter. The War Department has expressed the view that it would be desirable to conclude an agreement with the Italian Government providing that such persons would not be regarded by that Government as liable to military service in Italy or liable to any penalty for failure to respond to the call of the Italian Government for the return of such persons to Italy for service in the Italian Army. The department is now undertaking to negotiate a general agreement with the Italian Government with respect to the conscription of Italian subjects in the United States, and an effort is being made to settle this question in conjunction with the proposed agreement.

Very sincerely, yours,

(Signed) ROBERT LANSING.

The Hon. W. FRANK JAMES,
House of Representatives.

The alien slacker holding down a good job, and who is willing to have the boys in the land of his birth shed their blood for liberty and the boys in this land do the same while he lives in safety and ease, should have only one man in favor of him, and that is the Kaiser. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, in the first place, I would like to call attention to the confusion quite evident in the committee on the significance of comprehension of the phrase "central powers." Some say that it includes only Germany and Autria-Hungary. Others claim that it includes more. Evidently the meaning of the author of the bill is more than Germany and Austria-Hungary, because it says, "in war with Germany or with any of the other central powers," making it plural in meaning, so that I would suggest that this be made clear, to be set out so as to include Germany, Austria-Hungary, and Bulgaria and Turkey.

Mr. BURNETT. That was the purpose of the Bankhead amendment, which was satisfactory to me for the very reason suggested by the gentleman.

Mr. FESS. I think that is wise.

Now, Members of the House, I am in entire sympathy with what has been said here about the necessity of requiring those who come for the shelter of the Government to be willing also to undergo its burdens. I am in entire sympathy with that idea, but I hope that all of us will recognize this embarrassment, that, while the status of a resident of the country, whether a citizen or not, can be fixed by Congress by the authority of this Government, yet it is true that the relationship between citizens of other countries with this while resident here and the reciprocal relationship of our citizens with the same countries while resident outside of our own country is not so much a matter of legislation as of negotiations. That is a matter of treaty. Such relations are fixed by negotiations between nations.

If there is any violation of a treaty now existing, by this legislation, I recognize the strength of what has been said, and will certainly refuse to vote for any measure which does violate a treaty, because I do not think any Member of the House is willing to vote in direct violation of a treaty stipulation if he knows it to be such, and especially when that incubus or embarrassment is in process of being adjusted by negotiations now in action by the State Department.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Would the gentleman submit the question of interpretation to the House of Representatives?

Mr. FESS. I will say to my good friend from Pennsylvania that on a diplomatic question that must be determined by the State Department I would prefer to leave it to the trained diplomats and the counselors of the State Department rather than to the best lawyer in this House, because, while the best lawyer in this House comprehends more than the technicalities in the State Department, yet he will not see the delicacy of the problem of the State Department as clearly as the Secretary of State and his counselor will, since their main business is confined to such questions. Therefore, with the Rogers amendment, I will have no hesitancy in voting for this bill, but if that amendment goes out it will be quite serious. I note a strong contention that this does not violate a treaty. Then I can not understand why we should hesitate to leave the amendment in the bill, for it can not hurt anything. But in case the bill does violate a treaty, then the amendment saves our good faith in the force of a treaty obligation. Mr. Speaker, I repeat my entire sympathy in the purpose of this measure to compel alien residents to either do their part toward bearing the burdens of the country or submit themselves to deportation. But I should very much prefer to leave the matter with the State Department to be worked out through diplomatic channels than to supersede that method by action by this House, especially so long as there is a doubt of our clear right in the face of existing treaties.

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield one minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS].

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this whole question resolves itself down to this proposition: Shall aliens who have not patriotism enough to go home to fight for their own country, or who have not manhood enough to fight for the country of their adoption, be allowed to remain here to enjoy our opportunities while our boys are fighting for liberty and for justice and righteousness on foreign fields? Under this bill we do not compel anyone to join our Armies. We merely say to these aliens, who for their personal profit are living among us, "If you will not share our burdens you shall not enjoy our benefits." These profiteers at the expense of American manhood should either stay and fight or go and fight. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PAIGE].

Mr. PAIGE. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this bill, and I am opposed to the amendment offered by my colleague [Mr. ROGERS]. The Rogers amendment does not voice the sentiments of Massachusetts. The Rogers amendment does not voice the sentiment of the homes that have sent the pride and hope of uncounted households out to fight for the flag. If the Rogers amendment is adopted, in my judgment we might as well have saved the time which has been occupied in discussion for the last two sessions of the House on this amendment, because it leaves the situation practically where it was when we commenced the consideration of the bill. I trust that the bill will pass, and that the Rogers amendment will be defeated. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. I have only one more speech. I hope the gentleman from Alabama will use his time.

Mr. BURNETT. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN].

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, time and again in this discussion statements have been made that if this bill becomes a law certain nationals who are exempt from conscription in their old land will be conscripted under this bill, and particular reference has been made to the Irish. Now, may I be permitted to say that, in my opinion, in view of the fact that 30 per cent of our draft army are now of the Irish race, any Irish alien, or any other alien, who, enjoying the protection of the Stars and Stripes here in America, is unwilling to fight for this country ought to be brought within the scope of this bill, and my words refer to all aliens. The Irish alien who is afraid to fight, if there be such a man, is unworthy of the land of his birth and the blood that flows in his veins. [Applause.] For that reason, representing a district which has a large and patriotic Irish-American element, with thousands of boys now under the colors "over there" and over here, and speaking for that district, I am in hearty accord with this bill, and I believe my district to a man stands back of me. [Applause.] The mothers and the fathers of these boys want this bill passed to-day. We have too long delayed, and I fervently hope that this day will see this bill enacted into law in this House.

Mr. BURNETT. Will the gentleman use his time? We have only one more speech.

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY].

The CHAIRMAN. That is all the time the gentleman has. The gentleman from New York is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Gentlemen, it seems to me that the House is proceeding upon an erroneous basis when we debate what shall be done with the alien slacker. We all agree that the alien slacker shall be made to respond to service. We differ only as to the means which shall be employed to reach that end. Now, as I understand it, the State Department and the executive departments say to us that we are allies of Italy, Great Britain, and France, and they say to us that Great Britain, France, and Italy are to-day at the front fighting this war. It is not Americans as yet who are bearing the brunt of the fighting. It is the British, it is the French, it is the Italians who are bearing the brunt of the war at the present time. As I understand it, the State Department say to us that they believe they can make treaties with all of these, our allies, who are fighting our battles at the present moment, which will accomplish in good faith, in friendship, in amity with these, our allies, that which we seek to do by force. Now, gentlemen, is there any haste to force their hand? Is there any reason why we should do instantly and out of hand that which we seek to do by this bill? Can not we do it in a way to agree with our allies and friends? They have millions at the front where we have hundreds of thousands. Should we run the chance of having a disagreement and discord with them as a result of this?

Now, I am not saying that this bill should not pass; I am talking about the haste with which it should pass. I am talking about whether it should pass now or not. We are not going to be able to send any considerable number of men abroad until December. So that all this talk about our boys being at the front, shedding their blood, being in danger, is all anticipatory. But with our allies, with Great Britain, with France, and Italy, it is realization; it is not imagination; it is not anticipation. So I say there is not this haste except so far as we are concerned, and that, I am sure, we do not want to consider whether we shall make ourselves popular with our constituents and in the Nation at large, but whether we shall do that which is right and just and advisable as between us and our allies.

Now we come to a more serious question. We do not, any of us, differ as to what shall be accomplished. I am in favor of making the alien slacker do his part. The question is whether this is the advisable way to do it. If we are going to do it at all, if we are going to pass the bill, there can be no excuse whatever for excluding the Rogers amendment. There can be no excuse, particularly in view of this fact, that one of the circumstances that will be taken into consideration in construing this act will be the discussion upon this floor, and the fact that that amendment was offered; and if we fail to pass the Rogers amendment, it is a direct statement by this House that we do intend to flaunt our treaties, that we do intend to dishonor them, that we will not regard them. If the amendment had not been offered, if there had been no discussion, that could not be said. Now it can be said, and can we afford to permit that? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, as I have said all the time, if these treaties had been ratified and in operation there would be no use for this legislation, and the whole speech of the gentleman from New York who has just taken his seat is a temporizing policy. This does not interfere with treaties the Senate may ratify. If we pass this bill and send it to the Senate, the Senate will have the bill and the treaties also before it. If they ratify the treaties and if they are self-operating, they can amend the bill; but, gentlemen, for God's sake, do not let this legislation go over and let men from your district, boys in khaki, fight the battles of this country and of democracy and the alien slackers here dodge. Do not adopt the Rogers amendment, which will virtually emasculate the bill. Members who are in favor of this legislation, let us have a straightforward, heroic, courageous bill that means something. [Applause.]

In conclusion I desire to say that this debate has gone far afield, and I have not tried to suppress it. The amendment that is pending is an amendment that I have offered, and I do not want anybody to misunderstand it. It was recommended by the Department of Labor, and I hope that it will pass. The distinguished gentleman from Illinois, the able ex-Speaker, referred to the impossibility of deporting these aliens. That is provided for and taken care of by permitting the President to make such rules and regulations as are necessary to carry it out. Not only that, but in the last section of the bill it is provided that the law shall not end at the expiration of the war, so that if these fellows undertake to throw themselves back here and say you can not deport me and that you can not conscript me, we can answer them by saying, "Just as long as you stay here you are subject to this deportation and it must be carried out." I ask for a vote, and hope that the amendment will be adopted. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired, all time has expired, and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT].

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the Burnett amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection, and the Clerk read the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order, if it is in order to do so, against that amendment as not being pertinent to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is too late to raise the point of order. The amendment has been discussed for hours.

Mr. GORDON. That amendment does not apply to anybody covered by this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, let us have that amendment again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection, and the Clerk reported the Bankhead amendment.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ROBBINS. Would it be in order to amend that by striking out the words "Turkey and Bulgaria"?

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment would be in order.

Mr. ROBBINS. Then I offer that amendment, because we are not at war with those two countries.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the Bankhead amendment by striking out the words "Bulgaria and Turkey."

Mr. ROBBINS. And the word "and" should be substituted for the word "or."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be so modified. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BANKHEAD) there were—ayes 107, noes 6.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That this act shall not apply to accredited officials of foreign Governments nor their suites, families, guests, or servants.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I have been in the House quite a number of years, and in these years that I have had the privilege and honor of being a Member there have been many votes upon which gentlemen were sharply divided. I can not recall that there has ever been a vote when I could not reasonably understand why a man was led to his conclusion, but I frankly say that I can not understand how any man can look that flag in the face and vote for this bill. I can not understand how any man can think of his country and vote for this bill. I can not see how any man with his hand on his heart and with knowledge of his country in his mind can vote for this bill. I say that in all seriousness and earnestness. Such reasoning as I can command leads me violently away from such a course. Many Members evidently believe in the bill, but I can not follow or understand their reasoning.

When this measure was first proposed last summer it was treated as a joke, as it ought to have been. The Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House took up the matter, considered it, and found plainly and clearly their limitations and the limitations this House ought to feel under, and stopped. I find that this bill was introduced on August 3, referred to the Immigration Committee, and reported back to the House on the following day. A magnificent lot of attention and care and study it must have received from the Committee on Immigration! It does not reflect, it can not reflect either the combined judgment or patriotism of that committee. If there is anything this country has had to fight since the Declaration of Independence was acknowledged by Great Britain it is that a man who is a citizen of this country shall not be coerced into the military service by any other country in the world. You can take the reports of the State Department of any year you choose, and I defy you, taking any year at random, with your eyes shut, to find one where three-fourths of the work of the State Department has not been directed to preventing Austria or Italy or Germany or Russia, and, years back, England from compelling our own citizens who were abroad into the military service of that country from which they or their immediate ancestors had come.

And we won. Many of the cases were left undecided, but somehow we won, as far as the individuals were concerned. If you pass this bill you stand up and repudiate your country and your history and the spirit of American institutions. You repudiate everything that has been done for 110 years to make the citizenship of this country stand for something in the world. You tell the nations of the world that all that we have been claiming in the past was rotten buncombe, and that we are a Nation of four flushers.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I have only five minutes. I would be glad to yield if I can get more time.

Mr. WALSH. I would like to ask the gentleman what he thinks in respect to the effect of the treaties negotiated with England permitting this to be done?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I am just about to come to that. That is an entirely different proposition, an avenue along which we should move. There is a right way and a wrong way to proceed. This way is the wrong way. The right way is to make treaties with countries concerned, just as our State Department is now successfully doing.

Mr. DEMPSEY. You do not need anything except the treaty for that?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Not at all. And these treaties are being made now—already two are before the Senate for ratification. The Secretary of State says others will follow. You could not get Austria and Germany to consent to anything now, because we have no relations with them, but our allies are now making treaties with us to accomplish all the purposes of this bill. Then, too, Norway and Sweden and Denmark, I want to say to you, are not only interested in what you propose to do in this bill but have it very deeply at heart. And there are hundreds of thousands of their people in this country. These nations with whom we are at peace and amity we can, as we are, make treaties with them that will settle the whole question and settle it right according to law.

The rights of citizens of another country domiciled in the United States are fixed, first, by treaties; second, by international law. It is quite probable that the terms of this bill conflict with certain treaties we have made. It is certain that these terms conflict with such citizens' rights given them by international law. Treaties with sovereign nations whose nationals these citizens are is the only legal, the only American, way to proceed. We curse Germany, and rightly, because she violated treaties when she thought their observance no longer served her purposes. In this bill are we not doing precisely the same thing?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman may be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Minnesota be extended for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I object. The gentleman has just come in, and if he had been here listening to the debate on this bill he would have more knowledge about it.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, wait a minute. [Cries of "Vote!"] Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. When a gentleman objects to a unanimous-consent request has he the right, under the rules of this House, to cast aspersions upon another Member and make a speech?

Mr. BURNETT. I withdraw any statement I made, and I object to the extension of time.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The gentleman will have to do some more objecting before he gets this bill through.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama objects.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. He has a right to object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state he understood the remark of the gentleman from Alabama was withdrawn.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. No; he did not withdraw it; he can not withdraw it.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BURNETT. I desire to move that all debate on this section be closed in 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has been recognized. Does the gentleman yield for that purpose?

Mr. TEMPLE. Provided that it does not affect my rights under the recognition.

Mr. BURNETT. To this section and all amendments thereto.

The CHAIRMAN. The debate to close when?

Mr. BURNETT. In 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman does not intend to include within the 10 minutes the 5 minutes now allowed to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. TEMPLE. I would say, if I may have the gentleman's attention, I will yield for the chairman of the committee to make that motion, provided it does not affect the rights I have under the recognition that has been already granted.

Mr. BURNETT. I will yield five minutes of that time to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moves——

Mr. CANNON. Did the gentleman have recognition?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair had recognized the gentleman from Pennsylvania before the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. CANNON. Then his motion is not in order.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I make the point of order the motion is out of order, that the Chair had already recognized the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania yielded for that purpose, the Chair understood.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I will say to the gentleman I propose to offer an amendment to the motion, if it is put, and it may take some time before the amendments are all disposed of.

Mr. TEMPLE. I consented on a condition, and I am afraid the condition can not be met.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RAGSDALE. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has the floor, and nobody else can be recognized except by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. No one can take the gentleman off the floor except by his consent. The Chair understood he yielded to the gentleman from Alabama to make a motion.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Pennsylvania having been recognized and entitled under the rule to five minutes, he loses the recognition if he yields. Under the rule he can not barter away the rights of the balance of the members of the committee for his specific purpose without losing his recognition.

Mr. TEMPLE. My statement was that I would yield only on the condition that I would not lose those rights.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania for five minutes.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, I am very much interested in this bill, and I do not understand it as it is understood by the gentleman who spoke last. This is not a bill to compel aliens to serve in the armies of the United States against their will. It is true the supporters of the bill hope that it will have the effect of bringing some of these aliens into the Army, but it does not require them to serve. It merely says that if any alien claims the exemption which we recognize that he has the right to claim, on the ground of alienage, he shall thereafter be ineligible to become an American citizen.

Now, we have the right to say what kind of alien we are willing to naturalize. We have a right to say if a man will not fight for us when we need him that he need not ask us for the privilege of citizenship. [Applause.] This bill does not propose to compel him to serve as a soldier in the Army of the United States, and for that reason I feel quite sure that it does not violate the treaty under which we have bound ourselves not to compel aliens to serve in our armies. Italy does not recognize our naturalization. That is a matter for Italy to determine. It is up to us to protect an Italian-born naturalized American citizen if the occasion ever arises to do so. We have never had any trouble with Italy of that kind to amount to anything. We are not at all likely to have any trouble in the future. This bill is not going to make trouble, for in passing it we are not violating any treaty.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TEMPLE. Just for a question.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It is being recognized now that we have been violating treaties with first-paper citizens of neutral countries who are drafted into our Army and that these men are now being dropped out of the Army.

Mr. TEMPLE. Yes; aliens are being discharged from the Army.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. For fear of violating treaties.

Mr. TEMPLE. For fear of violating treaties.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Thereby making one kind of fish out of that form of alien and another kind of fish out of the other kind.

Mr. TEMPLE. That action has to do with citizens of neutral nations; this bill, on the contrary, applies only to citizens or subjects of nations now at war with Germany.

The gentleman who immediately preceded me said that Sweden, Norway, and Holland are vitally interested in this bill. They need not be. It does not touch a citizen of any one of those countries. It applies only to the subjects of nations that are at war with Germany or with other of the central powers. Sweden is not at war with Germany; Norway is not at war with Germany. It does not touch a citizen or a subject of any one of those neutral powers.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The gentleman is entirely correct. Their interest arises from this fact: That we departed from our traditional policy—the principle heretofore followed by us and insisted upon by every nation of the world.

Mr. TEMPLE. We have not departed in the slightest. We have never——

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I differ with the gentleman.

Mr. TEMPLE. We have never asked any nation to grant our citizens naturalization in their country on any terms except the terms that might please the Government of that country. [Applause.] And they can not ask us.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. TEMPLE. Very gladly.

Mr. HARDY. When Germany says to the women of Belgium, "If you do not work in the trenches, we will give you no bread," is that forcing them to work in the trenches?

Mr. TEMPLE. I do not care to discuss with any kind of approval the policies of the German Government nor to find any parallel whatever between that course of conduct and that which is proposed in this bill. There is no parallel. [Applause.]

Mr. HARDY. Is not there such a thing as a moral force as well as physical force?

Mr. TEMPLE. There is, and the moral force, let me say, lies with us. We have the right to say to an alien that will not assume our burdens that he can not share in our privileges. [Applause.] The moral right is with us.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TEMPLE. I have not time to yield further. There is one other matter in this bill which I would like to refer to.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has just expired.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, may I ask for five minutes more by unanimous consent?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, a few minutes ago the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] was taking the opposite side of the question and was delivering a very interesting talk upon this subject, and he asked unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more, and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] objected. I would like to know if he is going to make fish of one and fowl of the other?

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I object to that statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, if I believed that this bill would violate any treaty of the United States, I would vote against the bill. For that reason I am very much in favor of putting into the bill the Rogers amendment, which distinctly affirms that it does not violate and shall not be so interpreted as to violate a treaty. I believe that the bill without that amendment is not a violation of a treaty. I believe that it is not at all out of harmony with the promises we have made. Therefore I am willing to say so in the bill itself. What objection can there be to that on the part of a man who believes that it is not violating a treaty?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TEMPLE. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does it not make us perfectly safe on the international question?

Mr. TEMPLE. Yes. It makes us perfectly safe on the international question. I am in favor of the bill, because we have a right to say on what terms we shall make American citizens of foreigners who come to our country. I am in favor of the amendment because it places us where we have always stood—on safe, moral ground. [Applause.]

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TEMPLE. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I would like to inquire how long it would take to determine whether this violates any treaty?

Mr. TEMPLE. I do not care how long it takes. If a moral question is involved I will take all the time that is necessary to determine it. It is more important than the service of 100,000 men.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. But the practical value of this legislation is its immediate need.

Mr. TEMPLE. The practical value of it is not going to be very great.

Now, in regard to the last clause of the first paragraph in the first section, "as soon as practicable to be deported to the country of which he is a subject or citizen," I would be better satisfied with the bill if that clause were not there, but I do not think that it is particularly dangerous, because it will not be practicable to deport them. In the district that I have the honor to represent, according to the census of 1910 there were 92,000 men over 21 years of age, and 38,000 of these men over 21 were foreign born. Our mills and our mines—the coal mines that we needed this winter, that we shall need next summer—would practically stop operation if those aliens were deported. I am going to vote for the bill in spite of that clause, because I do not think it will be practicable to deport them. We can not get ships enough to take food and munitions and our own soldiers. It will not be practicable to deport these aliens very soon. Therefore that particular clause will not hinder my voting for the bill, especially if the Rogers amendment stays in it. [Applause.]

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moves that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by inserting after the language used by the gentleman, "to be closed," the words "in two hours."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is called for.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 7, noes 44.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota demands tellers.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TEMPLE. The amendment that was presented to the House was an amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] to strike out the last word. I ask if the debate on that amendment has been exhausted?

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment was withdrawn. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] asks for tellers. All those in favor of taking this vote by tellers will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Six gentlemen have arisen—not a sufficient number.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] that the debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I offer another amendment—to insert, after the language used by the gentleman in his motion, the words "in 20 minutes."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota moves to amend the motion made by the gentleman from Alabama by inserting the words "in 20 minutes." The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. MILLER of Minnesota) there were—ayes 12, noes 89.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment—to insert, after the language used by the gentleman from Alabama, the words "in five minutes."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. WALSH. The time to be used by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] moves to amend the amendment by providing that the five minutes shall be used by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is not in order to make a motion to close debate, coupling up with it a statement of who shall control the debate, and I make the further point that the motion of the gentleman is dilatory. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order made by the gentleman from Georgia. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois rise?

Mr. MADDEN. To make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will please state it.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to know whether the gentleman from Georgia can make two points of order at the same time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands he made only one point of order. The Chair sustains the point of order. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. MILLER of Minnesota) there were—ayes 71, noes 44.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama as amended.

Mr. BURNETT. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Minnesota may have five minutes [applause], and that I may have five minutes for reply, and that all debate on the section be then closed.

Mr. KEARNS. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Minnesota be allowed five minutes, and that he, the gentleman from Alabama, be allowed five minutes in reply.

Mr. BURNETT. And that all debate on this section shall then be closed.

The CHAIRMAN. And that all debate on this section shall then be closed. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. I make the point of order that that request is not in order until the motion has been disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. A request for unanimous consent is always in order. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. I object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri objects. The question is on the motion made by the gentleman from Alabama as amended.

The motion as amended was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has the floor.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BURNETT. I would like to know whether the gentleman has the right to the floor or not. I make the point of order that he has not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman.

Mr. FOSTER. I make the point of order that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] having once spoken on the amendment has no right to speak again. His motion was to strike out the last word, and that has not been withdrawn.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I make the point of order that the gentleman's point comes too late.

The CHAIRMAN. There is so much confusion in the Hall that the Chair can not hear what gentlemen are saying. The Chair would like to hear what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] is saying. The committee will be in order.

Mr. FOSTER. I make the point of order that the gentleman moved to strike out the last word and spoke five minutes upon that amendment, and that amendment has not been withdrawn. Now he rises again to speak on the same amendment. I insist that he has no right to recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] made a motion that all debate close. Then the gentleman from Minnesota moved to amend, to close debate in five minutes, and that amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota was agreed to. The Chair thought, and believes now, that the intention of the committee was to give the gentleman from Minnesota that five minutes. [Applause.] The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, when the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] a few moments ago objected to the request for unanimous consent, so kindly made by one of our colleagues, that I might have five minutes more, he coupled with the objection the very generous observation that had I been on the floor this afternoon where I belonged I would not now be asking for five additional minutes. Now, I do not blame the gentleman from Alabama at all for making that observation. I know that he is so interested in this bill that he is absolutely blind to everything else on the face of the earth. [Laughter.] I have been here on the floor of the House all the afternoon, ever since the House convened. I have not sat directly in front of the gentleman from Alabama, for that is not where I belong. I have been here attending to business. I have not been trying to inject myself into the debate every two minutes, but I did hope that before the debate closed I would have an opportunity to express my views briefly and tersely. I know that the gentleman from Alabama is very glad to apologize for that observation which he made, and his apology is now accepted, with many thanks. [Laughter and applause.]

But, seriously, gentlemen of the House, I believe that we are going to turn the clock a long ways back. I understand the temper of the membership of the House, and have understood it for three weeks. It is the disposition to pass this bill anyhow. I think I know from whence comes the voice asking for its passage, and it is no credit to them and less credit to us if we do not sit down carefully and analyze the situation and take that firm stand our judgment leads us to.

Now, let us see as to one or two things. In the first section of the bill it says that any alien eligible under existing law to become a citizen, who does not enter the United States Army but asks to be exempt or for whom some one else asks exemption is to be deported and never can become a citizen of the United States.

Now, take some cases, and there are hundreds of them. Here is a Greek, an Italian, an Englishman, an Irishman, if you please, who is here in this country, of military age, and who is willing to fight. He is desirous of fighting. He is drafted. He wants to go, however, and fight with his own people in his own country. I know of many such cases, and I have asked for some to be exempted myself on the condition that they would be immediately transferred to the army of the country that they came from. Now, that can not be done under this bill, and they could never thereafter become citizens of the United States. This does not say that they may be deprived of the right of citizenship; it says that they shall be deprived of the right of citizenship. This takes from them a right guaranteed by treaty and international law. To deny a person the right to citizenship under such conditions would be to deny him all rights under the favored-nations clause.

Do not talk to me about there being no coercion in the bill. It is coercion with a big club and sharp nails in the club. Why, when you give to a man the option whether or not he will go to a foreign country or stay here and fight in the Army, that is coercion. Let us exercise that coercion under the authority we get from treaties made, not in violation of treaties. Very likely it may be that he is in a condition where he can not get out without a serious loss, in which event there is serious coercion. I do not want to defend any slacker. If there is one thing on earth that I hope to see it is that every man capable of bearing arms will be fighting in the army of one of the allies until victory comes.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield? How many years does the gentleman think it will take for these fellows so eager to fight to get there?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I wish that I had time to answer the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That this act shall only remain in force during the continuance of the war with Germany, except as to the provisions of section 1 hereof.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 8, after the word "the" and before the word "war," insert the word "existing," and, on the same line and page, strike out the words "with Germany."

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, that amendment is satisfactory.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with amendments to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be adopted and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RUSSELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5667) to provide for the deportation of certain aliens, and for other purposes, and had instructed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote on the Rogers amendment, and on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment? [After a pause.] If not, the Chair will put them en gross. The question is on agreeing to the amendments, except the Rogers amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Rogers amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 4, after the word "citizen" insert the following:
"Provided, however, That this act shall not be construed to supersede the provisions of any existing treaty with such country the terms of which stipulate that the United States shall not subject the subjects of such country to compulsory military service."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Rogers amendment, and on that the gentleman from Alabama demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 131, nays 234, not voting 63, as follows:

Mr. WEAVER with Mr. HAUGEN.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote "aye."

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the Hall listening?

Mr. DENT. I was not.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman can not vote.

Mr. CROSSER. I desire to vote "aye."

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the Hall listening?

Mr. CROSSER. I was in the Hall, but I do not know whether my name was called when I was in the Hall or not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not bring himself within the rule.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote "no."

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the Hall listening?

Mr. KNUTSON. I was called out just for a few moments——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not vote.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I desire at the proper time to offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will let the gentleman know. The question is on the engrossment and third reading.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I desire to move to recommit the bill with instructions.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I am.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, with instructions to report the same forthwith with an amendment striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting the following:

"That during the existing emergency the duly accredited military representatives of any country engaged in war with any country with which the United States is now, or during the continuation of said emergency may be hereafter, at war, may, subject to the provisions of this act, draft into the military or naval service of their respective countries such of their citizens or subjects domiciled or resident in the United States as are not already in the military or naval service of the United States, and for the purposes of said draft of aliens domiciled or resident in the United States the President shall, on the request of said countries, presented through their diplomatic representatives, furnish to said representatives a full and complete list of all the citizens or subjects of the country making the request who registered under the provisions of an act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917. The President is further authorized and empowered to procure within 90 days of the passage of this act the registration of all other male aliens between the ages of 18 and 45, both inclusive, domiciled in the United States, and upon the completion of such supplemental registration shall on request furnish a full and complete list thereof to the respective diplomatic representatives of said countries of which the said aliens may be citizens or subjects. For the purposes of said supplemental registration the President shall have all the authority conferred by said act of May 18, 1917, and he may prescribe such terms, conditions, and regulations for the operation of said draft as he may deem necessary.

"SEC. 2. That within 15 days after the passage of this act the President may notify all countries engaged in a war with any country with which the United States is now or may be hereafter at war of the enactment of same, and through appropriate diplomatic channels shall ascertain what action said countries may desire to take under the provisions of this act.

"SEC. 3. That the President is authorized to detail such officers and men of the military forces of the United States to cooperate with and assist the military representatives of foreign countries in the operation of the draft as he may deem expedient, and he may cause aliens drafted to be summoned and to be detained temporarily at such places of concentration as he may designate, and may render such assistance in transporting or deporting such aliens as he may think proper.

"SEC. 4. That the penalties prescribed in the aforesaid act of May 18, 1917, shall apply to violations of this act.

"SEC. 5. That any alien who shall willfully refuse or fail to present himself for registration, or to submit thereto, or to appear in answer to any summons issued under authority of this act, shall be taken into custody, and delivered either to the military representatives of the country of which he may be a citizen or subject, or to such commanding officer of the United States military forces as the President may direct.

"SEC. 6. That citizens or subjects of the enemy country or of countries allied with the enemy may be drafted for and assigned to such nonmilitary occupation as the President may prescribe.

"SEC. 7. That the provisions of this act shall not apply to the citizens or subjects of countries who by the provisions of any treaty with the United States are protected from draft for military purposes.

"SEC. 8. That this act shall take effect upon its passage."

During the reading of the above,

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I think enough of the bill has been read to show that it is subject to the point of order, and I make the point of order against the bill that it is not in order. It is a conscription bill and not in order on this bill. The same kind of a question came up in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, something similar to that, and it was so ruled by the Chairman of that committee.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I do not care to contest the point of order, although I think it is in order. I desire to ask unanimous consent that the remainder of the bill may be placed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent that the remainder of the amendment or instructions be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The point of order is sustained. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. WALDOW. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays on that vote.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York——

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama demands the yeas and nays. Evidently there is a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 344, nays 21, answered "present" 2, not voting 61, as follows:

So the bill was passed.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

On this vote:

Mr. HAMILTON of New York (for) with Mr. SANFORD (against).

Until further notice:

Mr. LEA of California with Mr. CURRY of California.

Mr. STERLING of Pennsylvania with Mr. HEINTZ.

Mr. HOUSTON with Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota.

Mr. COX with Mr. MCCORMICK.

Mr. DIES with Mr. CAPSTICK.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee with Mr. BRITTEN.

Mr. KETTNER with Mr. COPLEY.

Mr. POU with Mr. FAIRFIELD.

Mr. RUCKER with Mr. GOOD.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. DALLINGER, is detained at his home in Massachusetts on account of illness. He has requested me to announce to the House that he is in favor of this bill and would have voted "yea" had he been able to be present.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Speaker, I am requested to announce for my colleagues, Mr. LAGUARDIA, Mr. DUNN, and Mr. SNELL, that they would have voted in favor of this bill if they had been present.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. BURNETT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. JONES of Texas, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for three days, on account of illness.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I want to submit a request for unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SIMS. I want to ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-night it adjourn to meet at 11.30 a. m. to-morrow.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry, but I think a great many Members expected that the House was going to meet at 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. SIMS. Let me explain. I understand there is going to be some time in regard to the change of reference of some bill, and I only wanted to get that in at that particular place before we take up the railroad bill.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, there are two or three committees, particularly the Committee on the Public Lands, that want to have a meeting——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I object.

SOLDIERS AND SAILORS' CIVIL RIGHTS.

Mr. WEBB, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted a conference report on the bill H. R. 6361, the soldiers and sailors' civil rights bill, for printing under the rule.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a patriotic address made in Pittsburgh by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. JAMES] on Washington's Birthday.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a patriotic address made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. JAMES] on Washington's Birthday. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. I object.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of presenting a unanimous-consent request. I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bill H. R. 9053, known as the Pacific coast military highway bill, a bill introduced by myself, and also other remarks upon that bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to print a speech of his own in the RECORD on the bill H. R. 9053, known as the Pacific coast military highway bill.

Mr. RAKER. The speech and remarks in regard to it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman if this measure has been reported out by any committee?

Mr. RAKER. It has not been reported.

Mr. WALSH. Then I object.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter on the subject of cotton.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter on the subject of cotton. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bill just passed, including the motion to recommit the same.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the bill just passed, including his motion to recommit. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California makes the same request. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object to all these.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object to the request of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON]?

Mr. WALSH. Yes; I object to them all.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, February 28, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the chairman of the board of trustees, National Training School for Boys, transmitting annual report for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting supplemental estimate of appropriation for increase in compensation of Senior Assistant Chief of Division of Customs, fiscal year ending June 30, 1919 (H. Doc. No. 960); to the Committee on Appropriations.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. GRIEST: A bill (H. R. 10293) to amend all existing pension laws granting pensions to minor children of soldiers and sailors of the Civil War, the War with Spain, and the Regular Establishment; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky: A bill (H. R. 10296) authorizing the Post Office Department to acquire and extend the telephone system of the District of Columbia; to insure the Government complete control of such means of communication in safeguarding its military and executive affairs within the seat of government; and promote the service to the public; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. SIMS: A bill (H. R. 10297) to amend an act entitled "An act to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads by compelling common carriers engaged in interstate commerce to equip their locomotives with safe and suitable boilers and appurtenances thereto," approved February 17, 1911; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. SMITH of Michigan: A bill (H. R. 10298) to prevent and punish the desecration, defamation, mutilation, or improper use of the flag of the United States of America; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. HOLLAND: A bill (H. R. 10331) to credit officers in the United States Naval Reserve with the time served in the naval auxiliary; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. EMERSON: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 254) requiring the War Department to return to America the bodies of soldiers who die in Europe during the war; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BOOHER: A bill (H. R. 10299) granting a pension to Hattie C. Huntington; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BRODBECK: A bill (H. R. 10300) granting an increase of pension to Mary J. Spate, helpless child of Joseph Spate; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 10301) granting a pension to Frank A. Smith; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CARY: A bill (H. R. 10302) for the relief of Ray Markey; to the Committee on Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 10303) granting an increase of pension to James Dougherty; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 10304) granting an increase of pension to George B. Amann; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 10305) granting a pension to Mrs. C. Silberberg; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. DOOLITTLE: A bill (H. R. 10306) granting a pension to Charles W. Cross; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. KAHN: A bill (H. R. 10307) for the payment of certain claims for services rendered the United States in the construction of a building at Mare Island Navy Yard; to the Committee on Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 10308) granting a pension to William Deable; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. KNUTSON: A bill (H. R. 10309) granting an increase of pension to Henrietta Archer Forbes; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Reahl, protesting against the proposed elimination of fuel jobbers; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. MORIN: Petition of the Oakland Board of Trade, D. A. Jones, secretary, urging that no change be made in the present postal legislation until same has had thorough trial and that any changes made later be with the view of a rate upon second-class matter that will more nearly cover cost of service; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. POWERS: Petition of Mrs. W. T. Horton and others, of Clay County, Ky., relative to increase in second-class mail rates; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. TEMPLE: Petition of members of the Methodist Episcopal Church of New Bedford, Pa., favoring national prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 28, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we thank Thee for the truth of life, the truth that not only pertains to our physical being but for that which has pushed back the curtain and given to us glimpses of the life eternal and of the infinite possibilities of life. We thank Thee for the truth tellers among men, men of vision, men of far-seeing wisdom, who understand and read the signs of the times, and lead on as God's light illumines the way. Now, we pray Thee to guide us this day in all truth, that we may come to its close with a consciousness of having done the Divine will. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. MCKELLAR and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—MEMPHIS AVIATION FIELD.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, some week or 10 days ago the New York World published an article by its Washington correspondent concerning me and certain other Senators. The article, so far as I am concerned, is wholly inaccurate and largely untrue. It is not my custom to notice such articles, and I would not do so in this case, except for the fact that it has since been republished in Tennessee, and for the further fact that I have since learned that the article was prepared largely by a young man who was the former secretary of former Senator Luke Lea, one of my opponents in the late senatorial primary in Tennessee. This subordinate of Senator Lea now represents Senator Lea's paper, the Nashville Tennessean, in Washington. The profiteers and their champions must be hard put to it when they are forced to employ such agencies to villify and abuse a man who has fought them in the open. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the article as it appeared in the World and copied in the Chattanooga Times be printed in the RECORD immediately after this statement. In addition I now desire to read the statement that I have made in reference to said article.

"FEBRUARY 26, 1918.

"THE CHATTANOOGA TIMES,
"Chattanooga, Tenn.

"GENTLEMEN: As a rule I do not attempt to answer criticism of the kind that recently appeared in the New York World and republished in your paper of last Sunday, and I would not do so now but for the fact that the Chattanooga Times has always been so loyally my friend, editorially and in its news columns, that I do not wish that you should be misled as to my actions by any such statement.

"I am not complaining of your publishing the article, for your paper is one paper that has a perfect right to criticize me whenever it sees fit, but I do wish you to know the facts.

"The article is adroitly worded, and is not only misleading and untruthful in character, but it is so craftily worded as to conceal the real truth. It gives a garbled statement of the RECORD, it publishes only a part of the RECORD, and it wholly falsifies my position, either by direct statement or by innuendo in three important particulars: First, as to my attitude toward the President of the United States; second, as to my attitude toward the War Department; and, third, my attitude toward the contract for the aviation field at Memphis and the system of letting contracts formerly in vogue in the War Department, now happily dispensed with.

"Mr. Editor, as you know, I have always supported President Wilson. There is no law on the statute books, so far as I can recall, which he has approved since he has been President that I did not vote for or support. I admire and esteem our great President very much. There is no man who could fill his position better in this great crisis. I doubt if anyone could fill it nearly as well. It seems providential that we have as our President in this the greatest crisis of the world's history a wonderfully able, calm, vigorous, determined, splendid man like Woodrow Wilson. My opinion of him is upheld by the records here, which show that every war measure that he has approved has received my vote. I have never publicly or privately criticized him, because I believe he is entitled to praise and support.

"Again, I have no grudge against the War Department. During this war it has done much for which it can be justly praised. It has also done or left undone things for which it has been very greatly criticized, and, in my judgment, properly so. Since the senatorial investigation the War Department has brought about a very complete reorganization of itself, and I believe it is doing better work now than ever before. It has adopted many important, effective, and far-reaching changes, which I think are the result of the Military Committee investigation.

"As to what this article says about the Memphis aviation field contract and my attitude toward contracts let by advisory committees of the Council of National Defense, I beg to say:

"When gentlemen come here from Tennessee seeking a contract, I either give them a letter of introduction or introduce them to the proper contracting officer. When Mr. Harmon, of the Harmon Co., referred to in the article, came here seeking a contract for the aviation field and telling me that he was a resident of Memphis and bringing letters from Memphis citizens, I gave him a formal letter of introduction to Mr. W. A. Starrett, the chairman of the emergency construction committee. There were a number of Memphis contractors wanting this aviation contract, and they all received the same kind of letters of introduction, or were introduced personally by me or by my secretary. I carefully explained to each one of these contractors, including Mr. Harmon, that I did not recommend any particular one for a contract, but that I hoped the contract would go to a Tennessee concern, because the camp was to be built in Tennessee.

"After I had given Mr. Harmon a letter of introduction, upon the faith of letters handed by him to me from Memphis friends, I found that Mr. Harmon had misstated the fact of his residence to me; that while he had done some work in Memphis, his firm was really located in St. Louis, and he himself lived elsewhere than in Tennessee. Upon learning this I protested to the War Department against Mr. Harmon receiving the contract, believing that Mr. Harmon had gotten the letter of introduction from me under a misstatement of facts. The falsity and maliciousness of the article published in the World and republished in your paper is shown by the following letter that I wrote to Capt. C. G. Edgar, of the Aviation Service, on August 24, 1917. This letter was in the RECORD, and if the World correspondent had wanted to be fair about the matter he should have published this letter, and then no statement from me would now be necessary. The letter is as follows:

"'MY DEAR CAPT. EDGAR: Your letter of the 23d about the Memphis contract received and noted.

"'The statement that you refer to in the third paragraph of your letter, which is as follows:

"'"Paragraph 3 of their (the emergency construction committee) letter states that this company was chosen upon recommendation by you."

"'This statement of the emergency construction committee is an absolute, unqualified, and unmitigated falsehood. There is not a word of truth in it. It is a subterfuge for the carrying out of their nefarious and, as I believe, crooked plans. It is in exact line with what they have been continually doing since it has been managed by these people.

"'A number of contractors from Memphis called to see me about this matter, among them Mr. Harmon, who told me that he was a Memphis contractor. He asked for a letter of introduction, which I gave and which is as follows:

"'"This will introduce to you Mr. I. G. Harmon, who has been in the contracting business for some time and is a member of the firm of Thomas-Harmon Co., of Memphis, Tenn.

"'"He wants to talk to you about building the aviation camp at Memphis. Mr. Harmon is a most excellent gentleman and entirely trustworthy and reliable, and I will appreciate any courtesies you may extend to him."

"'Mr. Alexander called in person, and I sent my secretary down to Mr. Starrett to introduce him.

"'Mr. Young, of Young & Son, came to see me, and I sent my secretary down with him to introduce him. There were perhaps other contractors who either came or wrote me, and to each one I stated that I was taking no part in the matter as to which contractor was selected, but that all I desired was that a Memphis contractor should receive the contract. To make absolutely sure on August 12 I wrote Mr. Starrett as follows:

"'"Inclosed I hand you an editorial from the Memphis Commercial Appeal, of date August 9, 1917. I have heretofore sent you a number of telegrams and letters of various Memphis contractors who desire to build the aviation school at Memphis.

"'"I have not recommended any particular one of these Memphis contractors. I make it a rule never to do this. However, I desire to commend this editorial to you, and earnestly insist that the work be given to a Memphis contractor or contractors. I believe the work can be done by them cheaper, quicker, and better than any outside contractor. This is naturally so. I stand willing to aid you in any way in giving you information as to any of these Memphis contractors."

"'And on August 16 I wrote Mr. Starrett as follows:

"'"In reference to the aviation camp, I wish to speak to you about two matters. There have been a number of Memphis contractors who have been to see me about the matter and a number more who have written or telephoned me about the matter. These letters and telegrams I have filed with you. I have uniformly told these gentlemen that I had nothing in the world to do with individual contracts and would not take any part as between them, but that I would recommend to you that this contract be given to some contractor in Memphis, to be selected by you, because I believe that, being there on the ground, familiar with prices there, familiar with labor conditions there, such a contractor could do the work more quickly and more cheaply to the Government than any outsider. If it were a small place, the situation might be different; but Memphis being a city of 175,000, what I have said is unquestionably true. In this connection, I herewith inclose you two telegrams that I have just received which explain themselves. It seems that all the contractors in Memphis have gotten behind the James Alexander Construction Co. They are very reputable people and can carry out any contract which they may make. So much for this.

"'"As you know, Memphis is one of the largest lumber markets in this country. The lumber for these camps can be bought more cheaply right there than elsewhere. I am not recommending any particular lumber firm, but I do know that the lumber that goes into these camps ought to be bought in Memphis, provided only that it can be bought there cheaper than it can elsewhere. In other words, the Government's interests should unquestionably be first both as to contractors and as to material. I know that that camp can be built more cheaply by utilizing Memphis contractors and Memphis materials.

"'"With much respect, I am,

"'"KENNETH MCKELLAR."

"'You will see from this last letter that when Mr. Starrett writes you that the Thomas-Harmon Co. received the contract upon my recommendation he writes you what is a deliberate and willful falsehood, as above stated, and which is here reiterated.

"'I have since learned that the Thomas-Harmon Co. is not a Memphis concern and that the only work of any importance that it ever did in Memphis was to dig a tunnel there; that it is a St. Louis concern and in no sense a Memphis concern.

"'I desire to protest against this contract going to this company and to say that if it is awarded to the Thomas-Harmon Co., I shall seek an investigation in the Senate by which the true facts can be ascertained and established.

"'I am informed that this contract was let by reason of influence that had nothing in the world to do with Memphis. As a matter of fact, its letting was a fraud upon Memphis and an outrage and a shame, for which I do not believe your department will for a moment stand.

"'I am sending a copy of this letter to Gen. Squier.

"'With much respect, I am

"'Very sincerely, yours,

"'KENNETH MCKELLAR.'

"Upon the receipt of this letter the contract with the Harmon Co. for the Memphis aviation field was very properly canceled by the War Department, and that contract was afterwards carried out by some other contractor, the name of which I do not now recall, but it was not a Memphis contractor at all. This letter gives the true facts and it speaks my attitude absolutely. I stand by it. I have no apologies to make for it, and I believe that you would have acted the same way if you had been in my place.

"Some time after the foregoing incident, I think probably during the recess of Congress or just before it adjourned, the War Department was appealed to by the Harmon Co. to get another contract, and I was informed that it afterwards received one. If it did, it was simply one of those acts for which the department was frequently criticized some time ago, and for which it deserves to be criticized.

"The man who gave out all of these cantonment contracts was W. A. Starrett, chairman of the emergency construction committee, Council of National Defense, formerly of the Thompson-Starrett Construction Co., of New York City. This Mr. Starrett was before the Senate Military Affairs Committee a few days before this article was published in the World, and I examined him at length about his method of letting contracts. Whether he was the instigator of the article or not I do not know. However, his testimony disclosed the fact that the George A. Fuller Co., of which his brother, Paul Starrett, is president, received several contracts, the fees of one contract alone being $250,000, and all the fees amounted up to considerably over one-half a million dollars—perhaps near three-quarters of a million dollars. It also disclosed that the Thompson-Starrett Co., of which Mr. W. A. Starrett was formerly a member, received in fees from the Government on contracts recommended by W. A. Starrett for building a portion of these cantonments, the sum of $1,002,500 for the 'know how.' The testimony also disclosed that a Mr. Mears was clerk for Mr. Starrett's emergency construction committee, and that he was a representative of the F. T. Ley Co., which got one of the cantonments and made a quarter of a million dollars out of it for the 'know how.' When asked by me what his connection was with these firms, Maj. Starrett replied:

"'We are architects and designed buildings that George A. Fuller Co. build; that the Thompson-Starrett Co. build; that the Fred T. Ley Co. build, Bentley.'

"Stone & Webster was one of the firms which received a cantonment contract at the hands of Mr. Starrett. This is the same Stone & Webster that also received the Hog Island contract. The contracts received by Stone & Webster from the Government amounted, as I am informed, to some $200,000,000 in all.

"There were also 11 men indicted the other day in New York for stealing $5,000,000 worth of uniform cloth from the Government. These gentry received contracts under the peculiar secret system of contracting that was recommended by the committee on supplies, and, I suppose, they and those who will defend them will also soon be saying that I am opposed to the President because I aided in the original investigation which opened the Government officials' eyes to their pilfering.

"Mr. Editor, in letting these Government contracts, one-quarter of them were let in New York State and one-half of them in the three States of New York, Pennsylvania, and Ohio. All the rest of the country received only as many contracts as these three States alone. Can it be wondered that we have railroad and industrial and labor congestion with one-fourth of all Government contracts in one State?"

Mr. KING. If the Senator will permit me, I noticed in a New York paper a few days ago an advertisement that the Thompson-Starrett Co. had a contract for $30,000,000. Is this the same Thompson-Starrett Co. to which the Senator refers?

Mr. MCKELLAR. I know of no other. I know that the company known as the Thompson-Starrett Construction Co. has received in fees on these cantonments $1,002,500 for the "know how."

Mr. KING. It advertised in the New York paper—an advertisement which occupied a third of a page—that it had a contract now with the Government for $30,000,000. I was wondering if the man Starrett to whom the Senator referred had anything to do with letting a contract to the Thompson-Starrett for the erection of a powder plant costing $30,000,000.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I can not say.

"I plead guilty, therefore, to the fact that I desired that Tennessee contractors should be treated fairly and on the same terms as all other contractors. I plead guilty that I stood up for Tennessee and Tennesseans. If my own people think that I ought to be abused for standing by them and for their rights and their interests, they are to say.

"Again, I plead guilty to being opposed to the supply committees of the Council of National Defense and their methods of dealing for the Government with themselves. I have not a word of criticism for the patriotic volunteers who come here and work for the Government without working for contracts or gains for themselves. They are entitled to great credit. It was the "dollar-a-year" volunteer who was feathering his own nest out of the Government that I opposed and to whom I am still opposed.

"I was opposed to the secret contracting system instituted by these supply committees. I was opposed to the letting of contracts with exorbitant fees to friends, favorites, relatives, or business associates who had the "know how" and the pull. I was and am opposed to robbing the Government at any time, at any place, under any pretext, in any way, by anybody. I have been opposed to these profiteers on the supply committees, and I have fought them since they first came here getting contracts, as above stated, and I believe that they have now all been dismissed.

"The Secretary of War has recently notified me of the following changes in his department: First, that the secret contracting system, which was recommended by these volunteer 'dollar-a-year' supply committees, has been abolished; second, that the 'dollar-a-year' patriots (?) serving on these supply committees, supposedly for nothing, but selling enormous quantities of goods to the Government, and who at the same time drew salaries or dividends from their employers while thus serving the Government in purchasing from themselves, have been dismissed; third, that our boys in the Army, many of whom during the recent cold weather were without warm clothing, had been furnished with clothing under the resolution which I got the Military Affairs Committee to adopt; fourth, that the whole Army purchasing system has been reorganized, and that all safeguards against inefficiency, dishonesty, and corruption have been taken in such reorganization. In other words, the War Department itself, by its own acts, has indorsed these several fights that I have been making.

"In addition to this, the President has recently ordered an investigation of the Hog Island contract iniquities, and I am prouder than ever of him for having done so. I am sure he is as much opposed to the profiteers as even I am. The efforts of these profiteers, or their excusers, or the efforts of those puny subordinates of the War Department who are friendly to them to try to make it appear that anyone who opposes their nefarious and profiteering schemes is opposed to the President of the United States is as infamous as it is untrue, because in making these claims these profiteers undertake to place our President in an attitude of approval of them.

"It begins to look, Mr. Editor, as if these profiteers have concluded to make a war on me because I have fought them and have fought their methods and have fought their system of contracting. If they have, I am ready for the fight. I have no apologies to make. Let the truth come out. If they had published all the facts I would have been content.

"If I am to be villified for standing up for the rights of Tennessee and Tennesseans; if I am to be villified for standing up for our Government against these profiteers, grafters, and thieves; if I am to be villified for standing up for our Government against secret contracts let to relatives, friends, favorites, or allied interests, costing the Government many millions of dollars; if I am to be villified for feeling that our boys in the Army should have warm clothing in winter and should always have proper medical attention when sick, then I am willing to stand the villification, knowing that I am right and my traducers are wrong.

"Yours, very truly, KENNETH MCKELLAR."

There being no objection, the article referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Chattanooga Times, Feb. 24, 1918.]

MCKELLAR IS UNDER FIRE—NEW YORK PAPER REVIEWS HIS MANY ACTIVITIES—THEORY AS TO SENATOR'S CRITICAL ATTITUDE—MORE THAN MERELY INTIMATED THAT TENNESSEAN AND OTHERS OPPOSED WAR DEPARTMENT'S METHODS BECAUSE OF FAILURE TO GET JOBS.

The activities of Tennessee's junior Senator, the Hon. KENNETH D. MCKELLAR, were reviewed at length the other day by the Washington correspondent of the New York World, and the story was given great prominence by that newspaper. It was stated that Senators MCKELLAR, WEEKS, and HITCHCOCK, who have led the opposition to the War Department's methods, have admitted they had failed to get Army contracts or positions for constituents, and a speech by JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS intimating that the opposition of the Senators was due to such failure is quoted. Senator MCKELLAR'S attitude toward the National Council of Defense is also dealt with at length. Here is the World's story as it relates to the Tennessee Senator.

[Washington correspondence New York World.]

Senator MCKELLAR received a rebuff at the hands of the Council of National Defense about the time the war started. He has persecuted it and tried to destroy it ever since. His cross-examinations of witnesses before the Military Committee, in an effort to prove that the members of the council were not actuated by patriotic purposes but by a desire to feather their own nests, have smacked of police-court hearings when common criminals are on trial.

Members of the committee have joked about his ferocity whenever the Council of National Defense came up for consideration.

Senator HITCHCOCK gave Gen. Sharpe a caustic examination to find out just why the War Department did not accept a hot-meal container offered by a constituent about whom the Senator wrote a letter to Sharpe.

Senator WEEKS revealed the fact that he had written a letter for a constituent who had a patent device for measuring feet. He thought that if the invention had been accepted, thousands of pairs of shoes too small to be worn would not have to be shipped to Army camps.

Senator MCKELLAR made his first open attack upon the Defense Council on July 17 last when he tried to curtail its powers. He discussed the question of permitting the council to make contracts.

The law does not permit the council to sign checks, and Secretary Baker testified that it had not signed any.

"I found a remarkable thing when I came to look into the matter," said MCKELLAR in the Senate. "I represent a State of 2,300,000 people, but it seems that no one of the Council of National Defense or its committees has ever found a Tennesseean whom he thought capable of serving on any committee in that body

"That seems rather a remarkable thing to me. In my State we have manufacturers, we have great lumber interests. We have cotton interests. We have cotton mills and great mills of all kinds all over the State. We have great steel mills in east Tennessee, and yet no one from Tennessee has been put on any committee on the Council of National Defense."

ELECTED ON SLOGAN "STAND BY PRESIDENT."

On June 13 Mr. MCKELLAR sent to Secretary Baker 26 questions about the advisory board of the Council of National Defense. He repeated the questions to the various members of the council. Mr. Baker acknowledged the receipt of the questions and promised to have some of them answered. He described the task of answering them as one of "great magnitude." From that time on Mr. MCKELLAR has nagged the council. He has hardly let up a day.

Mr. MCKELLAR is a newcomer in the Senate. He was elected for the term beginning March 4, 1917. One of his campaign slogans was "Stand by the President." That appealed to the stalwart Andrew Jackson Democracy of Tennessee, and Mr. MCKELLAR was elected over his Republican opponent by about 30,000. How well he has "stood by the President" the record discloses.

Early in his senatorial career Mr. MCKELLAR came in contact with the National Council of Defense. The Senator asked that some of his constituents receive a share of war contracts. Members of the council, most of them civilians, captains of industry, unschooled in sentatorial prerogatives, insisted on handling these matters on their merits.

Mr. MCKELLAR became angered on one occasion and wrote a letter to the Secretary of War protesting against the failure of the War Department to select a cantonment site in the swamps of Mississippi adjacent to Memphis, which he had strongly recommended.

Later Memphis was selected as the site for an aviation training field. A Memphis contractor wanted the $1,000,000 job of constructing this camp, and when the award went to a St. Louis firm Mr. MCKELLAR turned his wrath against the chairman of the emergency construction committee of the War Industries Board, which made the award.

He has become one of the most persistent naggers of the administration in the Military Affairs Committee, of which he is a member. The members of the committee who have attempted to discredit the conduct of the war eagerly hailed the Tennessee Senator's grievances.

WITH CHAMBERLAIN VOTED AGAINST WAR CABINET BILL.

When the war cabinet bill was submitted to the committee by Senator CHAMBERLAIN, Mr. MCKELLAR and Mr. HITCHCOCK were the only two Democrats who voted with him to report it out unfavorably.

Senator MCKELLAR'S especial grievance against the War Department is the Memphis aviation field contract. The stenographic report of a hearing held to investigate his charges against Maj. W. A. Starrett and other members of the emergency construction committee held in the office of the Secretary of War October 4 has just come to light. The facts developed at the hearing are interesting in connection with the investigations now being conducted by Senate committees.

When the Government determined to locate the field at Millington, near Memphis, a number of contractors entered the competition. The Thomas-Harmon Co., of St. Louis, received the contract over the James Alexander Co., of Memphis. Mr. MCKELLAR protested vigorously. The emergency construction committee replied by exhibiting a letter written to Maj. Starrett, chairman of the board, on August 7, which was construed as a recommendation of the Thomas-Harmon Co. This letter read as follows:

"This will introduce to you Mr. A. G. Harmon, who has been in the contracting business for some time and is a member of the firm of the Thomas-Harmon Co., of Memphis, Tenn. He wants to talk to you about building the aviation camp at Memphis. Mr. Harmon is a most excellent gentleman and entirely trustworthy and reliable and I will appreciate any courtesies you may extend to him.

"(Signed) KENNETH D. MCKELLAR."

Mr. MCKELLAR vigorously denied that he intended to "recommend" Mr. Harmon's firm for the award. This brought up the question, "When is a recommendation not a recommendation?" Maj. Starrett's committee also exhibited several letters from Memphis citizens recommending the St. Louis firm, which had been transferred by Senator MCKELLAR. The Tennessee Senator detailed in a letter to an officer of the Signal Corps the statement that company receiving the award was chosen upon his recommendation was a falsehood.

"It is a subterfuge for the carrying out of their (the emergency construction committee) nefarious and, as I believe, crooked plans," wrote Mr. MCKELLAR.

He had previously explained that when he wrote his letter he was under the impression that the Thomas-Harmon Co. was of Memphis, as he located them in that letter.

COMMITTEE EXONERATED BY COURT AND BAKER.

This charge aroused the War Department. Maj. Starrett demanded an investigation. The hearing was arranged with the Inspector General, Judge Advocate of the Army, and the Secretary of War sitting as a court. All interested parties were notified to appear. Senator McKELLAR failed to come to the hearing, and the committee was forced to take ex parte testimony. Senator McKELLAR contended that he should have a "congressional investigation."

The Senator declined to produce any evidence or enter into any specification of his charge of "crooked work." The charge rested solely upon his assertion.

The findings of this court, which were approved by Secretary Baker, held "that the charge must fall by the weight of the committee's great accomplishments, involving as it does the letting of contracts totaling about $150,000,000, carried out with unusual competence and without the breath of suspicion against the motives or the fairness of the experts who constitute the committee."

"It is futile and unfair," continued the report, "to challenge the good faith of the work of this committee in this particular transaction. Its recommendation, which resulted in the selection of the Thomas-Harmon Co., was unimpeachably right and could not have been disregarded. Such a charge could not be made by a fair-minded man familiar with the committee, its source of information, and its methods.

"The emergency committee since May has made systematic inquiries through all available sources of knowledge concerning responsible contractors capable of handling heavy construction under the peculiar conditions under which the emergency war building work for the Army must be done. For this purpose it has drawn on the knowledge of leading architects, civil and Government engineers, and members of the American Society of Civil Engineers for information which these authorities naturally would have.

"The soundness of the committee's conclusions in selecting the Thomas-Harmon Co. is entirely justified by the material in the possession of the committee as to the contractors available for the work."

Pending an investigation of the charges made by Senator McKELLAR, an independent contractor was substituted for the Thomas-Harmon Co. by the department.

HOLDS M'KELLAR'S LETTER RECOMMENDED THE FIRM.

"It is impossible to avoid the conclusion that Senator McKELLAR'S attitude was entirely favorable to the Thomas-Harmon Co., and that not only was he not averse to the award of the contract to that company at the time it was made but that it met with his entire approval," continued the findings.

"It is significant in this connection that no word of protest was heard from the Senator until after August 23, one week after the contract had been awarded to the company, when he received from the editor of the Memphis Commercial Appeal, a newspaper, a telegram advising the Senator as follows:

"'Look over St. Louis directory and you will find office of the contracting firm in it. If the Government gives that contract to a St. Louis firm there will be trouble. Kick like a steer and we will back you up.'"

Many other telegrams of similar import were received by Mr. McKELLAR.

TRANSPORTATION OF FOODSTUFFS IN THE WEST.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have a large number of telegrams here. I am not going to ask to have them inserted in the RECORD, but, if the Senate will indulge me for just a moment, I will state the contents of them, rather than to burden the RECORD with them.

The telegrams are addressed to my colleague [Mr. NUGENT] and myself; they are in reference to a situation in my State, and are in the nature of petitions which are entitled to consideration at this time. The telegrams relate to the food situation and the inability of the people who have a vast amount of foodstuffs on hand in my State to get it to market. One telegram from Payette, Idaho, states that 500 cars of apples in Payette urgently needs getting to market, and then goes on further to state that unless they are soon marketed they will be lost.

Another telegram from another portion of the State says—

Five hundred carloads of potatoes must be moved within 60 days or a total loss will occur.

A telegram from Idaho Falls, Idaho, covers the same subject matter from another part of the State, stating that—

Several thousand carloads of potatoes are waiting to be moved, and unless moved shortly will be lost.

Another telegram from Blackfoot, Idaho says—

Five hundred carloads of potatoes are stored at Blackwood and must be moved within 60 days.

This telegram is signed by the Bingham County Council of National Defense.

Mr. President, without putting all of these telegrams into the RECORD, I will say that they come from almost every portion of our State; and they disclose the fact that there is a vast amount of food supplies which will be lost within a few weeks if means of transportation are not had to transport them to market.

I think I ought also to say that we have presented this matter to the Food Administrator and to the Railroad Administrator, and we have been assured that everything is being done that it is possible to do to relieve the situation. With that statement I am not about to find fault; but, Mr. President, in considering this matter, both upon the part of the Food Administrator and the Railroad Administrator, we ought to take into consideration its seriousness from the standpoint not only of the immediate loss which is to follow to these people who, at great expense, have produced this food, but of the serious consequences which will result in the coming year's production. The loss immediately to be sustained will be great, but the loss from discouragement which must follow will be greater.

It must follow that if these products can not be cared for, if we are not sufficiently organized and systematized to take care of them when they are produced, the production will be reduced accordingly in all parts of the productive field. This will not be by reason, Mr. President, of any desire on the part of these people who may suffer the loss to revenge themselves against the Government, but for the reason that they will simply be incapacitated from going forward and producing as they had done in previous years.

I trust, Mr. President, in the midst of the multitude of affairs which we have on hand, and not seeking to diminish in any respect the other important phases of this war from any standpoint, that it will not be overlooked that, unless the productive forces of this country are taken care of, it will be little use to transport man power across the ocean to undertake to continue the war.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, before the Senator from Idaho takes his seat I should like to ask him a question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. KELLOGG. Is not the condition which the Senator from Idaho states as existing in Idaho substantially the condition in all the other Western States?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is so in Michigan; I know that.

Mr. KELLOGG. From Minnesota I have received telegrams to the effect that hundreds and thousands of carloads of potatoes, many of them needed for seed, can not be moved; that the car shortage in the last 30 days is the worst that was ever known in that State. I am told that that condition exists generally throughout the food-producing districts of the West, and I should like to know if the Senator from Idaho has any information on that subject?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have no doubt, from what I have read in the newspapers, and so forth, that that is the general condition; but, of course, I was confining myself to the presentation, as it were, of these petitions on the part of these producers. The telegrams I find are sent in the nature of petitions, and, without incorporating them in the RECORD, I took the liberty of epitomizing their contents. I have no doubt that the condition which they represent is the one very generally prevailing throughout the producing region of the West.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I have in mind one instance of the kind which the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] speaks, in the State of Washington, particularly in the Yakima Valley. An organization of producers there represent that they will need a certain number of cars—which they specify, some 3,000 cars—within a limited period of time to move fruit and the potatoes that are now on hand, and which must be moved within a certain time in order to prevent their loss, because they are perishable products. They state that the Northern Pacific Railroad, which serves them, has furnished a large number of cars, but that the Southern Pacific Railroad system, which also serves them, has furnished a very inadequate number of cars.

I noticed the exchange of communications between Mr. Hoover and Mr. McAdoo on the subject of the distribution of food, and on account of the importance of this matter and the necessity of attending to it immediately, if it is to be attended to at all, I furnished Mr. McAdoo on yesterday, by special messenger, a statement of these conditions, calling his attention to the statement which he had made through the press—that if the places where supplies of food were stored were called to his attention he would guarantee that railroad cars would be furnished to move them. I have hope and expectation that Mr. McAdoo, in accordance with his public declaration, will see that the Southern Pacific Railroad and the Northern Pacific Railroad and their connections which serve this great, productive valley, one of the richest and most productive in the world, will have the necessary cars to move this great supply of food.

It is not only important as it affects the supply of the people of this country and of our allies with necessary and healthful food products, but it is important in its bearing upon the production of food for the coming year and upon the fortunes and conditions of the people who have raised this food, whose entire means are invested in farms and in the business of producing food, who will be ruined if they can not market their crops, and who, if their crops are lost, will be discouraged from going to the labor and incurring the investment which is necessary to produce a crop for the coming year.

I make this public statement in order to emphasize what I have called personally to the attention of the officer of the Government who now controls all of these transportation agencies, and in order to impress upon him and everybody else who has responsibility in these matters the importance of giving to them immediate and efficient attention.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I simply wish to emphasize what my colleague [Mr. POINDEXTER] and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] have said. Some days ago I received several telegrams with reference to this very matter from the Yakima Valley, setting out the conditions there with reference to fruit, and potatoes especially. I took the matter up with the Director General of Railroads and with the Food Administrator, and they both assured me that they would and have given special attention to this situation, and that they have directed the railroads to furnish cars in order to move these products.

The situation can not be emphasized too strongly. The suggestion that my colleague has made is a very valuable one. It is not alone the value of the crops that are already produced, but it is the influence upon future production that taking care of the present situation will have. If the fruit and the potatoes that are now in the pits and in the warehouses are not gotten to market, it will greatly discourage the production of these products for the coming year.

Last year there were special appeals made out in my section of the country, at any rate, and especially in the Yakima Valley, for the production of potatoes, and under the impulse of these appeals many thousands of acres were put into potatoes. Now the producers are threatened with the loss of thousands of tons of these potatoes because of their inability to get them to market. There is a pretty fair market for them; but the cars can not be obtained to transport them. A special effort ought to be made to meet the situation; and, as I have said, I have the assurance of the Railroad Administrator and the Food Administrator that special efforts are being taken to meet that situation.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think we are all impressed with the importance of securing transportation facilities to move these crops; but when the Food Administration arbitrarily classifies farm products and grades this tremendous potato crop and, disregarding a very large percentage of the crop because, forsooth, they have not all grown to just that circumference which, in the judgment of the Food Administration, they should have attained, we are met with a situation that is most perplexing and most discouraging. I know that is the case in my State, where a very large part of last year's potato crop has been utterly disregarded and discriminated against by the Food Administration officials, and our protests are in vain; they disregard common sense and resort to the scientific aspect of potato growing as a justification, and we seem to get no further.

I believe the Senator from Washington is a member of the Committee on Agriculture?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; I am not.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well, I am sorry; I wish he were.

Mr. JONES of Washington. There are good members on that committee.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; that is a good committee; and when that committee appears with the Agricultural appropriation bill and brings in its report, the Senate ought to assert with vigor the rights of its constituency to be heard and not leave this whole question of regulation to the ipse dixit of a few men who have no direct responsibility to the people of the country.

I am thoroughly aroused by the lack of interest shown by the food officials to the pleas of the farmers of the country; and at the first opportunity in this Chamber we are going to have tested the question whether by regulation or by law the rights of these people should be maintained and respected.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, with reference to that, I desire to say that while it has not been especially called to my attention by residents of the State of Washington, I have heard something about it. In my judgment, it is extremely unwise to try to impose new regulations and new methods of marketing food products in time of war, when the necessity for getting them to the consumers is so great. It may be important to have potatoes standardized, graded, and so on, but Congress has not yet acted upon that matter; we have not taken steps for the grading of potatoes; and this is not the time to inaugurate a system of that sort, that can only result in delay in getting potatoes to the consumers and also cause irritation upon the part of the producers. If there is any time when potatoes should be marketed as they have been marketed heretofore this is the time. I will not use harsh terms, but it seems to me it is extremely unwise for the Food Administration or any other branch of the Government to try to impose new regulations, and all that sort of thing, that we did not think about imposing in time of peace. It is all right to take them up and consider them in normal times. Apples, for instance, we have graded; and they can be graded without very much trouble; but as to potatoes, it is a very different proposition. I heard some one talking yesterday about potatoes and referring to some nice-appearing large potatoes he was using which, when opened up, were found to have hollows in them. We know how that is, and no system of grading can avoid anything like that.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The grading system is unfair to the farmers of Michigan and other sections of the country.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that Senators must address the Chair.

Mr. JONES of Washington. No administrative department of the Government ought to try to impose such regulations as this in time of war, when the important thing is to get the products to the consumer. Do not harass the producers now when consumers are longing for products, large or small. Do not try to inaugurate a system of grading potatoes when the people are ready and glad to take them large or small. Furnish cars, let them be gotten to the consumers, and they will take care of the situation so far as grading is concerned. The man who takes advantage of the situation to enforce his ideas of grading food products is aiding our enemy most effectively.

RELIEF FOR CALIFORNIA OIL PRODUCERS.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD for the information of Congress, which is now considering a relief measure for the oil producers of California, a letter in the form of a petition from the Boston-Pacific Oil Co. The statement is so concise and it puts the question so clearly that I trust it may be read by all Members of this body who desire enlightenment on the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

SAN FRANCISCO, February 13, 1918.

Hon. JAMES D. PHELAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR PHELAN: Having before me a copy of a proposed bill, designated S. 2812, and believing that you should at this time be accorded all the information and enlightenment possible relative to the facts upon which a majority of the oil operators in California base their respective claims against the Government, in order that you may be enabled to measure the justice of their said claims, I herewith beg to submit for your consideration a short history of our company's operations and a statement of the facts upon which we base its right to the oil land which is the subject matter of the litigation now pending between the Boston-Pacific Oil Co. and the Government.

During the month of February, 1910, I made an examination of the land, title to which is now in dispute, viz: Two certain 80-acre tracts located in Kern County, Cal., and designated as the south half of the southwest quarter, and the south half of the southeast quarter, of section 32, township 31 south, range 24 east, M. D. B. & M., which land was then considered wildcat territory. Thereafter, and on the 15th day of March, 1910, I secured from our predecessors in interest certain leases, with options to purchase said tracts of land, and thereupon assigned the same to the Boston-Pacific Oil Co., a corporation created for the purpose of financing and developing the same; and said corporation thereupon commenced and prepared said tracts for drilling, and began actual drilling upon one of said 80-acre tracts as soon thereafter as water was available therefor, to wit, about the 15th day of May, 1910.

This first effort in drilling, which was made on the south half of the southwest quarter of said section, resulted in an unavoidable accident, whereby we lost the hole at a depth of about 800 feet, and which accident cost the corporation approximately $50,000; and when it became apparent that we could not recover from said hole the broken tools, etc., which had caused the disaster, we started a new hole or well on the same tract, and within 50 feet of said first attempt, finishing the same on the 25th day of April, 1914, at a cost of approximately $95,000.

During the month of June, 1910, the corporation purchased other and additional material for the rig, then upon the second 80-acre tract, viz, south half of the southeast quarter of said section, hauled additional material for derricks thereon, and commenced assembling; and thereafter the work of drilling a well thereon was commenced, and thereafter projected continuously, in good faith, and as expeditiously as possible under the adverse conditions then prevailing in the field until the discovery of oil thereon in paying quantities, on the 8th day of June, 1912, at a cost of approximately $104,000.

Our said predecessors in interest had, prior to the date of the "Taft withdrawal order" of September 27, 1909, performed the necessary assessment work on said land, under the "placer mining laws," and in addition thereto had graded said tracts for derricks and building sites, purchased and hauled upon said land material for bunk houses, derricks, and other equipment, etc., preparatory to drilling when the necessary water could be made available, pursuant to plans then initiated and put into effect by them for bringing it in from a distance of 12 miles (the completion of which work of bringing in said water in the month of April, 1910, alone cost them approximately forty-two thousand ($42,000) dollars). And said predecessors in interest based their claims to said land, upon said work so performed in good faith, and upon the validity of their locations, which elements are not put in issue by the Department of Justice, in said suits in equity heretofore instituted by the Government as aforesaid. Therefore the directors of the company, being advised by able and reputable attorneys, that, by reason of said valid locations and said work done in pursuance thereof, said predecessors in interest had thus acquired a valid, vested right, as against the Government, in said lands, which vested right was alien-able; purchased the S. ½ of the SE. ¼ of said section, paying therefor the sum of $124,000, taking a grant, bargain, and sale deed to the same. Subsequently the corporation entered into an agreement to purchase the adjoining 80-acre tract (S. ½ of the SW. ¼ of said section) for the sum of $80,000; and the deed to said tract, duly signed and acknowledged by the grantors thereof, is now in escrow, to be delivered to the corporation upon the payment by it of the balance of said purchase price.
